NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE wish which we give to one another for a Happy New Year has in it a deeper note than usual. Too often it is connected in our thoughts with the blessings of health and wealth, or the satisfaction which comes to us through the achievement of our own desires. Ours will not be the happiness of untroubled lives—that is far from our minds; but there may come to us, even in the midst of trouble, the joy which is given to those who do the will of God, who contend in a noble cause, and endure with a lofty courage, and spend themselves generously in helping human need. We do well to wish one another the happiness of strength and faith for these difficult tasks.

SUNDAY is to be observed in this country and far beyond its borders as “a Day of humble Prayer and Intercession to Almighty God on behalf of the cause entrusted to our King, our Empire, and our Allies, and on behalf of the men who are fighting for it on sea and land.” We are glad that the word “humiliation” has been avoided not that we should not all desire to be penitent and humble, but on account of the rather abject associations of the word, which are out of keeping with the sincere feeling of men who believe that they are contending in a righteous cause. What we are all asked to do is to join in a corporate act of religious sympathy and remembrance, to cleanse our hearts and renew our strength before God. With our prayers there should also blend quiet meditation upon the spiritual sources of power and renewed consecration of ourselves to the living will of justice and loving-kindness in public affairs, which alone can make a people truly great. The money which we are asked to contribute to the fund for the Care of the Sick and Wounded in the War will give a beautiful touch of practical sympathy to the services of the day.

AMONG the Christmas Day sermons which have been reported in the press there are two utterances which seem to us specially calculated to bring the idealism of lofty hopes to wavering hearts. Dealing with the sad reflection, which has become prevalent in some quarters, that Christianity has failed, the Dean of Durham spoke as follows:—

They said, and truly, that in Germany there had been a fearful repudiation of the principles of Christendom. They might say not less truly that the opposition which Germany had provoked demonstrated the strength of the hold which those principles possessed. Let them remember that physical force became charged with moral energy when it was the servant of justice. The battlefield became radiant with moral witness when its carnage was transfigured by unselfish devotion and its anguish was mitigated by ministries of love. Christ had not failed if in this hour of national exasperation they trampled on the desire for vengeance and set their minds firmly on the victory of justice; if, as they fought their difficult way across the scenes of wanton destruction, our soldiers remained steadily true to the humane and generous sentiments which they learned in Christian homes; if those in training at home and presently in the campaign abroad set themselves resolutely against those sins of the flesh which too easily assailed them; if they revered women and children, resisted the temptation to excess, and guarded their own character from shame.

The other passage occurred in the sermon by the Dean of St. Paul's, which was devoted mainly to the commemoration of the Hundred Years' Peace between this country and the United States.

The history of the relations between the two countries, he said, seemed to furnish a good answer to those who thought that the present deplorable state of things in Europe must necessarily continue. For a hundred years America and Canada had been at peace—a true peace, not watching and snarling at each other like dogs. On the summit of a lofty pass over the Andes which connected Chile and Argentina in a scene of wild desolation stood in solitary grandeur a colossal statue of our Blessed Lord, with hand uplifted to bless the two countries. This statue, moulded of melted cannon, was set up by the two Republics to commemorate the triumph of peaceful arbitration over the spirit of war. It was a glory to America and a reproach to Europe when frontiers were marked by fortifications and armed soldiers scowling across barbed-wire defences. Millions in Europe looked to America as the land of hope, and they were justified. Hope and freedom gave a buoyancy to life there rarely seen at home. It was significant that none of these new nations showed any wish or tendency to introduce militarism of the European type. The modern State, the State of the future, was pacific. That country alone was great and happy in which the citizens thought first, “What can I put into the common stock?” not “What can I take out of it?” Was it possible that we should ever return to class warfare, to sectarian warfare, to political warfare? We had called a truce to them now because it would be mere insanity and treason to do otherwise, but how would it be when the external pressure was removed? It was not a truce but a lasting peace we required if our dear country was to survive as a great nation.

The Note of friendly remonstrance which has been addressed by the United States to our Government on the rights of neutral shipping in war time will be regarded by sensible people without a trace of clamour or irritation. On the whole the tone of comment in the Press has been admirable in its restraint and good sense. The questions which have been raised can be discussed between us without producing anything approaching to diplomatic tension. Every one here will recognize that America is entirely within her rights in trying to secure her trade from injury. On the other side, we doubt not, there will be an equal readiness to admit that we are very anxious to reduce the damage and suffering which the war must inflict upon neutral countries as much as we possibly can. Two things must be remembered. Firstly, that any measures which are calculated to shorten the duration of the War will ultimately be favourable to the trade and general prosperity of neutral countries; and secondly, that our command of the sea, while it may give rise to sporadic grievances, or even to acts of apparent harshness, is the best guarantee which America and other neutral countries can possess for the safety of their commerce.

SOME interesting particulars of the number of Belgian refugees in this country are given in the report of the Departmental Committee, which was issued last Saturday. 110,000 have arrived already, and arrangements are being made to bring over more in order to relieve the excessive pressure in Holland. Offers of hospitality have been received for over 100,000 refugees in various parts of the country. The larger centres where refugees have been received, while finding hospitality for a certain number in their own area, have also acted to some extent as clearing houses for adjoining districts. Under this arrangement Glasgow has received 3,092; Sheffield, 1,500; Leeds, 1,200; Birmingham, 2,099; Manchester, 1,441; Bradford, 400; Exeter, 2,000, and other places considerable numbers.

THE Committee speak in warm terms of approval of the general behaviour of the refugees, and the spirit in which they have borne themselves during a period of suffering and unexampled strain. The following words put the cases of difficulty which have occurred in their true perspective:—

The comparative success of the work is no doubt largely due to the character of our guests, of whose conduct there have been hardly any complaints worth mentioning, and who have shown themselves not only brave and patient, but accommodating in circumstances of desolation so grave as to disturb the equanimity of the most tolerant people. But our own people may take credit for the spirit in which a great undertaking has been carried through. Poor and rich alike have vied in showing practical sympathy with our Allies. Trade unions have subscribed to the wants of their fellow-labourers; families, with barely room for themselves, have pinched and squeezed to enable them to give hospitality to the poor Belgians. Instances of this spirit might be multiplied indefinitely.

SEVERAL suggestions have been made in regard to avenues of employment, where the element of competition with British labour would not exist, but after careful inquiry the Committee are unable to recommend such schemes as sugar beet cultivation, State afforestation, and the reclamation of waste lands. Their conclusion is that in the case of qualified workers for whom no openings in British industries exist they should be employed in making clothes, furniture, and other articles for household use, which should be placed at the disposal of the Belgian Government in order to meet the needs of the Belgian people at the close of the war on their return to their own country. It is pointed out that workshops of this description will require careful organization. It will also be necessary to distribute the refugees to the centres in which their services can be utilized.

THE political follies of German professors are in danger of producing a policy of retaliation in this country which will not redound to the credit of our intellectual sanity. There can be little doubt that the exaggerated valuation of German thought and scholarship, which had become an obsession in small coteries in England, will pass away. The trade in bad translations of German books, without any grace of style or light of imagination to commend them, will be severely depressed, and the patient reviewer will heave a sigh of relief. But it is far too soon to attempt any new valuation of the German contribution to the realms of knowledge which ignore national boundaries. It is even possible that German learning will have a new charm for us when it begins to be modest. For these reasons we deprecate the explosive letters of Prof. Sayce and some other writers in The Times. By all means let them rid us of the obsession of pan-Germanism, but in doing so let them not forget to be true citizens of the commonwealth of the spirit, in which every true and noble thing which men of German blood have thought or said must be included.

THE announcement that Dr. J. E. Carpenter will retire from his work at Manchester College, Oxford, at the end of the present session, and will be succeeded in the office of Principal by Dr. L. P. Jacks, will come to many of our readers as a sharp reminder of the passage of the years. He joined the staff of the College in London in 1875, and is the last of the group of distinguished theologians who migrated with it to Oxford in 1889. He has been known in the world of scholars as a Biblical student of wide and varied attainments, and as a pioneer in the study of Comparative Religion. By the band of men in the active ministry who came under his influence, he will be remembered as a noble friend of inexhaustible kindness and generosity, for whom duty and religion were always the most precious things in life. Few men have been able to combine in such just proportions the hard industry of the recluse with the practical activities of the man of affairs, retaining with unabated force through all their studious years a keen personal interest in the causes of freedom and social good, with which the name of Carpenter will always be associated.

IN Dr. Jacks the College will have a Principal whose reputation has been won in other fields. As editor of The Hibbert Journal he has revealed gifts which might have made a fortune in Fleet Street. As an author who has achieved success in imaginative literature, he has troops of friends here and in America who have never even guessed that he is a Professor of Divinity. As a theologian he will take into his new office keenness and subtlety of mind, a wide knowledge of human life, and a saving gift of humour. The new member of the College staff will be the Rev. Henry Gow, who will act as Tutor in New Testament and Related Subjects. We believe that we are betraying no secret when we say that the interest in Mr. Gow's appointment centres chiefly in the influence which a man who still retains his place in the active ministry will be able to exercise upon the life and aims of the students. He will act as a link between the quiet world of study at Oxford and the world of living men in London. His aim as an expositor of the New Testament will be not to compete with other specialists on their own ground, but to encourage the study of it as a living book for preachers, an inexhaustible mine of human experience and divine teaching. Those who know Mr. Gow, his success as a minister and his stimulating influence as a friend, will regard his selection for this special work with great interest and high expectations.

THE SOVEREIGNTY OF LOVE.

Most of us have never desired so eagerly to possess the power of reading the secrets of the future as we do at the present moment. What will the year 1915 bring to us? Will it see the end of the war and the beginning of the millennial reign of peace, with militarism despised and rejected, and goodwill established among the nations of the earth? These are the visions which haunt us. Almost we persuade ourselves that it is within our own power to make them come true. Groups of people set to work to draw a new map of Europe: they discuss the problems of nationality and foreign policy; they lay down the terms of settlement with the high-sounding phrase "war against war" on their lips; they persuade themselves that this is the last time that armies will take the field so long as the earth endures. All this is excellent in its way. We must keep our ideals shining brightly before our eyes, even when they seem least practical. We must also bring all the intelligence and sagacity at our command to bear upon the problems which have been created by the war, or which will spring up speedily in its train. But we doubt whether many of these things are the primary business of religion at the present moment. What we need above all is spiritual power strong enough to utilize what is good, and to displace what is bad, in the loyalties which have captured men's hearts, and a sense of spiritual mission which will give us cohesion and definiteness of purpose in the face of the world.

For it is clear that we have got a very little way in understanding the deeper motives of the present situation when we talk vaguely about the menace of militarism. This struggle for mastery, like every other struggle which is concerned with ultimate things, is religious, and this war may be truly described as a war of religion. It is this fact which gives it its intensity and much of its bitterness. In a dynastic war the people are listless, but they are not listless now, for it is a conflict of ideals which touches us all, a challenge thrown down to the Christian valuation of life, a radical disagreement about the things which we ought to love and admire in men and nations, and to serve with complete self-devotion. To our ears much of the language which comes to us from Germany seems merely bombastic, but upon closer scrutiny it reveals itself as the natural expression of loyalty to the State and of devotion to the sovereign, in whom the power and ambition of the State find a personal centre. It is this which gives it its emotional fire, and imparts to it a quality which can only be described as religious. To many Germans the singing of 'Deutschland, Deutschland über Alles,' touches the same chords as an act of worship, and any insult offered to the Kaiser is a form of sacrilege. But let us illustrate this point of view by the exalted language of one of her leading men. It enshrines a theory of sovereignty, but it is hardly the sovereignty of Christian love. The quotation occurs in an essay by Mr. A. E. Zimmern which has been published this week.*

"The Prussian outlook [Mr. Zimmern writes] is so foreign to Western habits of thought that it is well that we should try to understand it at its best. Prussia proper has not been rich, like the rest of Germany, in poets and imaginative writers; but she is fortunate to-day in possessing in the greatest living Greek scholar, Prof. von Wilamowitz-Moellendorf, a man who by birth and breeding is able to put the highest interpretation upon the aims and spirit of the Prussian State. To Wilamowitz Prussia is not only nearer and dearer than Athens. She is better, and more advanced. At the close of a wonderful address on 'The Glory of the Athenian Empire,' in which he has employed all the resources of his wide learning to paint a picture of Ancient Greece at her best, Wilamowitz breaks into this impassioned peroration: 'But one element in life, the best of all, ye lacked, noble burghers of Athens. Your sages tell us of that highest love which, freed from all bodily entanglements, spends itself on institutions, on laws, on ideas. We Prussians, a rough, much-enduring tribe of Northerners, may be compacted of harder stuff; but we believe that love is on a higher level when the fullest devotion to an institution and an idea is inseparably linked with an entirely personal devotion to a human being; and at least we know how warm such a love can make a loyal heart. When our children have scarce learned to fold their hands before God, we set a picture before them, we teach them to recognize the noble features; we tell them, 'This is our good King.' Our young men, when they are of age to bear arms, look with joy and pride on the trim garb of war, and say, 'I go in the King's coat.' And when the nation assembles to a common political celebration, the occasion is no Feast of the Constitution, no Day of the Bastille, no Panathenaic Festival. It is then that we bow in reverence and loyalty before him who has allowed us to see with our own eyes that for which our Fathers dreamed and yearned, before him who ever extends the bounds of the Kingdom in Freedom, Prosperity, and Righteousness, before His Majesty the Emperor and King."

The reference in this striking passage is to the Emperor William I. But the motive remains the same in the case of his grandson, though to foreign eyes the object of it seems much less worthy. If it is the will of the King to be the father of his people, he showers down upon them the blessings of peace. If he appears before them in shining armour, like some warlike figure of the Apocalypse, he arrays them for battle, and leads them forth, like the hosts of Islam, to conquer the world for its own salvation.

We need not pause to point out our radical disagreement with this theory of the King as a demi-god who can do no wrong. It is hostile to every cause of good which we hold dear. In the last few weeks we have seen how it can enlist the basest passions as its fanatical allies. What we want to ask is this, How are we going to combat it? We cannot kill it with anger or strong words. Many victories on the stricken field may still leave it untouched in human hearts. If we rely solely upon our fleets and our armies for the future peace of the world, we shall be of all men the most miserable. For we are at close grips, not only in Belgium, but in the hidden places of the soul. Now, as always, the inferior spiritual loyalty can only be displaced by one that is stronger and more compelling. Are we fit exponents of the kingliness of Love? Is our faith in goodness so radiant that men, when they see it, will desire to possess it? Is our confidence in the unseen things of the Spirit so rich and true that it can fill and satisfy human hearts when they have cast their idols to the moles and the bats? Does our religion blend so intimately with daily life as to make us just and kind and generous, and seeing these things the stranger will want to share our secret? Those who ask these questions honestly will find in them much cause for misgiving and confession of sin. The spiritual triumph which we desire is much farther off than it ought to be, because we are still such imperfect Christians and we have loved but little. There is need for all the energy which can be given to the problems of peace and re-settlement on the political field. But there is equal need of spiritual concentration, of intimate communion with God, if the false loyalties which have wrought such havoc in the world are to lose their power to destroy and to crumble away into forgetfulness.

This is the first business of religion, of the church. It is with a sense of special mission and divine opportunity that we enter upon the tasks of another year. Forgetting many of the things which are behind, our barren controversies, our personal estrangements, our exaggerated concern for the minor details of faith and practice, we would unite ourselves with undivided heart with all who are prepared to pray, to suffer, and to work for the kingdom of God. The Will to Power and all the false motives which surround it can be vanquished, but only with the sword of the spirit, when, with one heart and one soul, we yield ourselves as willing captives to the service and sovereignty of Love.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

THIS is the effect which every great sorrow and struggle has upon a noble soul. Come to the streets of the living; who are these whom we can so easily distinguish from the crowd by their firmness of step and look of peace... holding, without rest or haste, the tenor of their way, as if they marched to music heard by their ears alone? These are they which have come out of great tribulation. They have brought back into time the sense of eternity. They know how near the invisible worlds lie to this one, and the sense of the vast silences stills all idle laughter in their hearts. The life that is to other men chance or sport, strife or hurried flight, has for them its allotted distance; is for them a measured march, a constant worship. "For the bitterness of their soul they go in procession all their years." Sorrow's subjects, they are our kings; wrestlers with death, our veterans; and to the rabble armies of society they set the step of a nobler life.

GEORGE ADAM SMITH.

WHAT your eyes see, what your hands touch, are only shadows, and the sound which strikes your ear is but a gross echo of that holy and mysterious voice which adores, and prays, and groans in the bosom of creation.

For every creature groans, and is in the pangs of birth, striving to be born to veritable life, to pass from darkness unto light, from the region of appearances to that of realities.

This sun so brilliant, so beautiful, is only the vesture, the obscure emblem of the true sun, which gives light and warmth to souls.

The real world is veiled from you. He who withdraws into the depths of his own soul catches glimpses of it as from afar. Secret powers which slumber within him awake for a moment, lift a corner of the veil which Time holds down with his wrinkled hand, and the inner eye is ravished with the marvels it contemplates.

You are seated on the shore of the ocean of life but you do not penetrate into its depths. You walk at night by the side of the sea, and you only see a little foam which the waves cast up upon the shore.

To what else shall I compare you?

You are like the child in the womb of its mother awaiting the hour of its birth; like the winged insect in the crawling worm, aspiring to leave this terrestrial prison to wing your flight toward heaven.

LAMENNAIS.

I DREAMED of Freedom slowly gained

By martyr meekness, patience, faith,
And lo! an athlete grimly stained,
With corded muscles battle-stained,
Shouting it from the fields of death!

I turn me, awe-struck, from the sight,
Among the clamouring thousands mute,
I only know that God is right,
And that the children of the light
Shall tread the darkness under foot.

I know the pent fire heaves its crust,
That sultry skies the bolt will form
To smite them clear; that Nature must
The balance of her power adjust,
Though with the earthquake and the storm.

God reigns, and let the earth rejoice!
I bow before his sterner plan.
Dumb are the organs of my choice;
He speaks in battle's stormy voice,
His praise is in the wrath of man!

Yet, surely as He lives, the day
Of peace He promised shall be ours,
To fold the flags of war, and lay
Its sword and spear to rust away,
And sow its ghastly fields with flowers!

WHITTIER.

ALMIGHTY God, the unfailing Source Of light and mercy, who has brought us to the beginning of this year, and art sparing us to love Thee and to keep Thy commandments; prepare us, we beseech Thee, for the coming days.
Let Thy grace enlighten our darkness and strengthen our weakness. Help us to forget the sins and sorrows of the past, cherishing only the wisdom and the humility they may have taught us.
Inspire us with new purposes and new hopes. Deepen within our hearts the love of truth and goodness. Renew in us the life of that which alone makes life worth living. Enable us to discern the solemn meaning of these earthly days, and the high and sacred purpose for which they are given. Suffer us not to be unfaithful to Thee. Thou hast richly blessed us hitherto: still lead us by Thy hand: still admonish and guide us by Thy Spirit; and leave us not to ourselves, Thou Good Shepherd of the sheep. Let not our sin take from us the thought that we are Thine. Let not the sorrow and weariness of life, nor the darkness and mystery of the world, rob us of our faith in Thee. Whatever light may shine or shadow fall, keep us in the fellowship of those who trust and obey Thee, and in the love and service of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

DECEMBER 31, 1914.

"Peace and Goodwill," the angels sang
When Christmas first had birth,
The angels knew they welcomed then
The dawn of Heaven on earth.
How often since has Peace seemed fled,
Goodwill replaced by hate!
How often faith in God seemed dead,
Despair of man how great!

Once more a Christmas morn has broken,
A year has closed in war,
Bringing to anguished hearts no token
From loved ones fallen afar.
O may the year which dawns to-morrow
Some brighter days reveal,
Some lighter load of strife and sorrow,
Some heaven-born power to heal!

Forbid the soul faithless to fret!
Too short the span of years:
Why waste the hours in vain regret
And unavailing tears?
Keep trust when dark the future lowers,
Give help though thanked by none;
There beams beyond the gloomier hours
An ever-radiant sun.

"Peace and Goodwill," the heavenly strain!
To man the years seem long,
No angel voices sound again,
Yet truth lives in their song:
They see the hour, unseen by mortals
When wars and hate shall cease,
And all draw nigh the heavenly portals
To sing "Goodwill and Peace!"

THOUGHT AND ACTION.

THE extraordinary vogue which mysticism has recently enjoyed, the newly awakened interest in the mystical writers, and the widespread demand for new editions and translations of their books, as well as for books about them, has been frequently commented upon. It has been suggested that this sudden popularity has its dangers. There is a false and a true mysticism—or, perhaps, one should rather say, a false and a true view of mysticism—and the kind which is most likely to attract the passing interest of a great number of people is the false. To them it appears as a very beautiful adjunct to life—a set, as it were, of beautiful and elevating thoughts which they may bring out and enjoy in moments of leisure or devotion. Contemplating these thoughts, they may escape for a little from the hurry and the vexations of life, and refresh themselves by indulging their quietistic tendencies. And they return to the world, not only refreshed by their brief departure from it, but also with a pleasing sense that they possess more delicate spiritual perceptions, and consequently live on loftier heights, than their neighbours. "Ah, my dear, we are mystics! The world does not understand us!" one lady was heard to remark to another with great complacency.

At a time when everything that is false, or hollow, or insincere is crashing about our ears, its impotence revealed by the dread test of War, there will be no greater downfall than that of this false mysticism. No one has time or inclination now for vague musings, aspirations, or studies which have no relation to life. If that is all that mysticism has meant to us, if it has been merely a species of mental and spiritual relaxation or indulgence, then we must cast it aside as the footballers and cricketers do their games, and devote ourselves to the stern duties of the moment. But those who have grasped the real meaning of the mystic message know that they have in it something of the very stuff of life itself; that to hold fast to that is to hold fast to the sternest, most strenuous, and most painful duty that can be demanded of man. The oneness of the human with the Divine, the immanence of God—these are the conceptions which have power to lift our souls above the life-and-death struggle of the nations, above the hideous hate and slaughter that are defiling the earth, and at the same time to nerve us to take our part nobly in the great struggle.

But are such thoughts as these the prerogative of a small class only—of the thinker, the philosopher, the man of religion? Are they altogether incomprehensible to plain men of action—to Tommy Atkins, still lustily singing "It's a long way to Tipperary" in the thickest of the fight, and flinging himself upon the foe with a jest upon his lips?

If so, the man of thought is almost tempted at the present moment to say he will have none of them, that he will allow himself no consolation which his brother of action cannot share. The boundary line between the world of thought and the world of action—those necessary complements of one another—seems to be drawn with a cruel precision. That part of the human race which inhabits the one seems to understand so little of the life and motives of that which inhabits the other. Is it education or temperament which draws that sharp dividing-line? And is one to believe the philosophy of Aristotle and the mediæval schoolmen when they tell us that the higher way is the way of contemplation, because it lifts us nearer to the unmoved Mover of the universe; or Mr. Rudyard Kipling and the moderns, who are all for exalting the Sons of Martha? Mr. Kipling hymns them thus:

It is their care in all the ages to take the buffet and cushion the shock.

It is their care that the gear engages: it is their care that the switches lock.

It is their care that the wheels run truly:
it is their care to embark and entrain, Tally, transport, and deliver duly the Sons of Mary by land and main.

* * * *

To these from birth is Belief forbidden;
from these till death is Relief afar.
They are concerned with matters hidden—under the Earth-line their altars are.

Just now the question—always a difficulty to some minds—presents itself with some urgency. The men of thought want to feel at one with the men of action, and the fundamental distinction between the two worlds thrusts itself in the way of complete sympathy and understanding. But any such fancied separation is due to a misconception. Oneness with the Divine, the immanence of God—what do they mean if not a close and indissoluble union between all who share the vital force of the one Life of the universe? It is for the men of contemplation, who have trained themselves by long discipline to the ineffable joy of realizing God, it is for them to bring into that Presence, and hold there, those who are doing His work, filled with the same Infinite Spirit, however little time or ability they may have to realize it, that floods the consciousness of those who pray for them at home.

So is an immense responsibility laid upon the men of thought. So do barriers between them and their brothers on active service disappear. And so, too, do we learn the true lesson of the mystics. We of the present age have been trying to ignore the paradox upon which our life is built. We have been trying to live without dying, to find without losing. To do so is contrary to the law of the universe. It is those who have made the attempt who have been proving themselves remote from life—not the mystics, who have never for an instant been deceived. They have always known that "No cross, no crown" is the motto, not of Christianity only, but of the universe. But they have known, too, that God is immanent in His sinning, suffering world. And that is the secret of their power. We must not forget either how marvellously they have mingled the contemplative with the active life. We have only to think of the almost incredible fullness and activity of such lives as those of St. Catherine of Siena and St. Francis of Assisi to see how communion with the unseen has resulted in strenuous material activities. The lonely vigils on the mountain tops of Galilee, the busy days of service and self-spend-ing, in which there was no time so much as to eat bread—that is the kind of mysticism which has an imperative message for the needs of the moment. There is no place to-day for the man of thought who despises action. May we not also say that there is no place for the man of action who despises thought? "He that doeth the will shall know of the doctrine." Thousands of brave men who are going forth to fight for their country will come back with that in their hearts which they did not take away—a new knowledge, a new understanding, which they do not and cannot express in words, even to themselves, but which, nevertheless, will be there. And thousands more who will never come back—theirs it will be to see, not "through a glass darkly," but face to face, "the Love that moves the sun and all the stars."

EVEN the calm temperament of The Athenæum is feeling the strain and passion of the war. The tasks of criticism and the quiet walks of literature seem a little aloof from the emotions of the hour. In an interesting leading article in the current number there is a hint that it will give itself more definitely to the tasks of right thinking, without abandoning its devotion to literature, pure and simple, in the coming year. There is also an exhilarating touch of social idealism in the announcement that it contemplates some measure of industrial co-operation in its business affairs.

RELIGION WITHOUT THOUGHT.

SIR,—Your criticism of Miss Underhill's 'Practical Mysticism' in your issue of 19th inst. seems to me unsympathetic and unfair. To call mysticism "religion without thought" is certainly to misrepresent it. Religion relieved from the burden of other men's thinking is a more truthful definition. It is an effort at a directness of apprehension, an effort to respond to divine sensation. And in this effort we can learn much from the study of the bee, the dog, and even of the jellyfish in their effortless response to the instinct divinely implanted in their being. As Miss Underhill says: "Eternity is with us inviting our contemplation perpetually," and to do this, as Emerson says, "the worshipper must greatly listen to himself, withdrawing himself from all the accents of other men's devotion." This seems very hard and unnatural to men accustomed in matters of the soul to listen to any one rather than to themselves. And thus the neo-Catholic cult of "the little flowers of St. Francis," for instance, with all their puerilities, will have many more adherents than the sane mysticism of Madame de Guyon. The ordinary philistine, indeed, cannot understand religious contemplation without a crucifix, or religious emotion without a sacrament, just as the Jansenists were misunderstood in their day. No doubt some readers will not be familiar with some of Miss Underhill's allusions, or with the tags of learning she brings in. But, on the other hand, no one is likely to come to the book without a personal bias, or some previous knowledge of the subject, however slight, and in this book it is to them she appeals, to those who would be deterred from what you describe as the fairly good book on mysticism by the same author. We must not forget that the spiritual detachment which the quietist and the mystic seek to cultivate depends upon a spiritual attachment no less real and permanent. To strengthen this attachment is the object of such a book as this. You say there are far better guides than Miss Underhill to the treasures of mystical literature and the secrets of mystical experience to whom the average man may turn for information and help, but you omit to mention any. Wherever he turns the average man will soon find out that mysticism is not "religion without thought."—Yours, &c.

Manchester, December 28, 1914.

[Our correspondent does not point out any inaccuracies in the review in question, but we print his letter because he supplies quite unconsciously an admirable illustration of the danger which the reviewer obviously had in mind. Any form of religion, whether it is called mystical or not, which tries to dispense with the hard discipline of thought and the experience of other men as conserved for us in history, is likely to become sensuous and sentimental. We need hardly point out that the title of the review, 'Religion without Thought,' was not intended as a description of mysticism, as our correspondent wrongly asserts. It was used simply in reference to Miss Underhill's book with its dangerous cult of mere sensation, and we do not think it unfair as a word of warning. Mysticism of this perverted type has often carried men over the brink of moral disaster.—Ed. of Inq.].

SERVICES OF INTERCESSION.

SIR,—A copy of THE INQUIRER for Saturday, December 19, has come into my hands, and I find in it a comment on the Intercession Services held at St. Paul's Cathedral continuously for twenty-four hours on the Wednesday and Thursday of that week. The first paragraph is appreciative of the spirit of the instructions given at those services, but later there is adverse criticism as to the intention and religious value of such services which I think needs correction, as it gives a wrong impression on several points. The idea of continuous intercession for twenty-four hours is much the same as that of daily intercession in the churches throughout the time of war, or the setting apart of one special Sunday (January 3, 1915), when all places of worship in the United Kingdom are asked to hold intercession services relating to the War in the place of the ordinary services. It is a special united effort of prayer at a time of exceptional national danger, anxiety, and suffering, and it is surely reasonable to believe that such special efforts are right and acceptable in special circumstances. There is no question whatever of "dragging the Divine Will down to the level of our desires" in these or any other of the Church's special services for special occasions, and it is difficult to see why you should suggest that there was any such object in view at St. Paul's. I quite agree that in order to "lift our desires up into conformity with the Divine Will" we "must bring concentration of mind and the freshest of our powers," and this cannot be done if a service is "unduly prolonged," and therefore too fatiguing. But are you aware of the way in which these services were organized, or do you really imagine that any one person or group of people were engaged in prayer for twenty-four hours at a stretch, or even for any unduly long time? The twenty-four services were undertaken by representatives of the London Rural Deaneries, each deanery sending, I believe, about 200 people to take part in one service, lasting for an hour or rather less, at some stated time during the twenty-four hours. In this way continuous prayer was offered during the twenty-four hours without undue strain on the faculties of any one congregation. I understand that the general public were also at liberty to attend these services, and as it was stated in a London daily paper that the attendance at the Intercessions was extremely good and far in excess of what was anticipated, it seems evident that the services were found helpful and appropriate and were much appreciated.

As to the last sentence of the criticism. The writer says: "It has too much ecclesiastical mechanism about it, and encourages the belief, which still has a strong hold upon many minds, that we shall be heard for our much speaking." I should be interested to hear whether the writer was present at any of the services, and if so what he found in it that struck him as being merely "ecclesiastical mechanism." Also, in what way did the services encourage the idea that we shall "be heard for our much speaking"? The writer is probably aware that the "much speaking" denounced in the Bible refers to vain repetition of mere words that do not come from the heart; but most believers in prayer would, I think, agree that frequency, regularity, and perseverance are important elements in prayer, as in ordinary affairs of life. I have been told that these special services were of a simple, informal character, in some cases conducted by laymen—and it is well known that all services in St. Paul's Cathedral bear a high character for real devoutness and sincerity.—Yours, &c.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

MEASURE six feet four inches on the door-jamb, and you will see whether Abraham Lincoln could have entered your house without stooping, even after he had removed the tall, quaint chimney-pot hat, brown with age, which he was accustomed to wear. He seemed too tall for the tailors to find cloth enough to cover his legs, for his trousers were too short. In one hand he would carry a faded green umbrella, with the knob gone, and tied round the middle with a piece of string; in the other hand a carpet bag. His hat off, releasing his shaggy black mane, you might have agreed with the boy in the street selling portraits of the President that "he will look better when he has had his hair combed." If you had found it hard not to smile at the first glimpse of the lean, sinewy giant, you would probably have been rolling on the floor in uncontrollable laughter when he sat down and, turning his brown furrowed face and deep grey eyes upon you, began telling those funny stories of which he had an inexhaustible store.

Some serious people said he was a fool, a mere jester. Ah! but there are fools and fools. "Honest Old Abe" was God's own fool, and a hero of the first brand into the bargain. As men have said, he came from Illinois, which signifies in the Indian tongue "the land of full-grown men." His stout but tender heart had shown its quality from the days of his childhood onwards. The son of a poor backwoodsman, and born, as all the world knows, in a log cabin, Abraham had schooling enough, in short stretches, and less than one year in all, to learn with his mother's help, to read and write. So he read whatever good books he came across — history, poetry, and others, which led on towards the profession he at length took up, that of a lawyer. In one house in which he lodged he was to be seen lying on his bed studying grammar, while his long leg rocked the baby's cradle. With strength equal to his stature, though naturally gentle, he proved, when occasion demanded, that he was a match for ruffians, and as an expert woodsman earned the nickname by which he was known at the election for the Presidency of the "Rail-splitter." And indeed his actions were such as to bring to mind the god Thor, who was said to split mountains with his hammer. Abraham Lincoln did no less.

When but a youth he piloted a flat-boat laden with farm produce down the Mississippi to New Orleans. There in the market he saw a slave-girl sold by auction, and the sight moved him to such fierce indignation that he exclaimed to his companions, "If ever I get a chance to hit that thing [meaning slavery] I'll hit it hard."

He did hit it hard. When at last he became President there were four million slaves in the United States. Lincoln wanted to set them free gradually and peacefully, establishing them in settlements of their own, and paying the owners for their loss. But the slave states would not hear of it, and tried by force of arms to break away and form a slave-holding nation by themselves. So the war came on. For four long years it raged, and when at last it ended, in the spring of 1865, the United States was finally established as one nation and not two, and slavery had been swept from the Continent. The wise, gentle, heroic soul who had guided the state through all its immense difficulties and sacrifices to this glorious victory was the quaint rail-splitter and side-splitter of the West — "Father Abraham" of the soldiers, "Massa Linkum" of the negroes. It was a terrible time. He was worn out and old with the weight and anxiety and sorrow of it all. Gladly, he said, he would change places with the soldier who was sleeping on the open ground. Yet he laughed and made others laugh more than ever, and no one could quite measure him up. "I laugh because I must not cry," he said, and "but for this I should die." He did not omit to laugh at himself. Blessed laughter, wine of heaven!

The tempest of war passed, and with it the great President. But Lincoln knew not death when he fell under the bullet of an assassin as he sat watching a play. "Die when I may," were his words, "I want it said of me by those who know me best, that I always plucked a thistle and planted a flower—when I thought a flower would grow."

Lincoln's noble utterance to his country in the midst of its war is the highest appeal possible to us to-day. "With malice toward none; with charity for all; with firmness in the right, as God gives us to see the right, let us strive on to finish the work we are in; to bind up the nation's wounds; to care for him who shall have borne the battle, and for his widow, and his orphan—to do all which may achieve and cherish a just and lasting peace among ourselves, and with all nations." MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

MANCHESTER AND DISTRICT.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

It is much too early to attempt any forecast of the effects of the great European conflict upon the churches. That they will emerge from the crisis unchanged is not to be expected, and, in all probability, such a vast upheaval will leave its mark upon organized religion for long stretches of time. But the situation is not one that should encourage a feeling of fatalism. We ought rather to assure ourselves that the matter is largely in our own hands. What the churches are to be after the war will be determined, to some extent at least, by their action during the war. It is really much more possible to effect a change in the outlook and fortunes of a cause amidst stirring and momentous circumstances than in times of stagnation and established indifference. To say the least, the world and its mind have been shaken out of their habitual complacency, the great deeps of human thought have been broken up as they rarely can be except once in an age, and there is, therefore, an immense opportunity for really living forces of thought and faith to make an appeal. Given a body of men prepared to strike while the iron is hot, much might be done. If a constructive faith, rising clear of mere negations, can gather up afresh the great Catholic hopes and insights of the Christian religion for the healing of men's woes, now is the time for it. Already it has been found, in this district as elsewhere, that the impending issues of such grave national and world-wide concern have quickened the sense of serious awe among worshippers. The attendance at services has been noticeably larger. Some ministers have even been able to start regular week-night services of intercession. From some of our congregations and schools the number of young men who have joined the Army has been proportionately large, and so the matter has been brought very nearly home. For the same reason, however, some Sunday classes and week-night social activities have had to be relinquished for the present. Perhaps no harm may eventually result from this cause if thereby the ministers and other leaders are set free to give themselves more fully to a study of our deeper and more central needs of the spirit. In this connection it is interesting to note the continuation of the Cross Street Chapel Mid-day Services, which were begun in time of peace, but which are now a specially appropriate reminder, amidst all the rush and noise of Manchester life, of the real sources of a nation's strength. It is no small achievement to have carried on these services almost without interruption through winter and summer alike. They are now well on into their second year of existence. The ministers of the neighbourhood take a few services each in turn, and as yet we have not gone through the list, so that no heavy burden is entailed on any one.

Another interesting experiment, the success of which appears to be abundantly assured, is the Student Ministry of the Oldham Road Church. The students of the Home Missionary College have thrown themselves heartily into this work, and the results are most satisfactory, both for the Church and for the students who obtain, in this instance, a splendid preparatory experience of ministerial duties. This is but one of the many effective ways in which the College operates for good, and it will be noted with much pleasure that the number of students is so large in this very exceptional year. By the way, the history of the College is now advertised at a popular price. Those who heard the Warden read an instalment of it at the opening of the College in the autumn will look forward with interest to the appearance of the book. Another matter in which the district has already received promise of help from the College is the revival of lay preaching. There has for a long time been in existence a Lay Preacher's Union which owed much to the faithfulness of Mr. Canning, its Secretary. The time has now come for a fresh appeal to the young men of our churches who may have gifts and the right spirit for this kind of work. The District Association has appointed a Committee to go into the matter, and although nothing can yet be said about details, there are great hopes that a new departure in this branch of our efforts may coincide with a religious awakening and a new evangelistic spirit. What Methodism and Congregationalism owe to the immense army of unpaid, unprofessional, but none the less genuine ministers of Christ can never be told. If the churches of the district will ponder these possibilities much will be done. That there is always a field for courageous enterprise is certain. Our latest illustration of this is Moss Side, where, under the spirited leadership of Mr. Salmon, much new interest has been aroused, in spite of the great difficulties that must be felt in a church which has suffered so much from removals. This is a common trouble. We have not yet found a way to cope with the increasing mobility of our population—one of the outstanding new social phenomena of our time. The leakage from our churches from this cause alone is very serious. It would be different if we had a church in every town in the country; but we have not, so that when members who have worked hard in one of our congregations move away to other spheres of employment the chances are much against their finding an accessible church of their own persuasion. And even when such a church is accessible there is often a lack of the fellowship that ought to make the wanderers feel that they had only left one spiritual home for another. And it is not all wanderers who earnestly desire a home.

Perhaps it may be permitted to say a word in this trying time on behalf of the Domestic Missions. It will be agreed that whatever need is likely to be felt for some time to come will be specially felt by those among whom our Domestic Missions perform their beneficent work. While so many other good causes are being remembered, it would be a pity if this old and permanent cause, to which we as a people are so deeply pledged, were to suffer. We are bound in honour to see that this at least shall be maintained in its full efficiency. Splendid work goes on all the year round at Renshaw Street (Hulme), and also at Willert Street, where the work is being continued under the able leadership of the Rev. W. F. Turland, who has consented to take a temporary engagement. The people have rallied well at the latter place after the painful blow they suffered in the death of the Rev. H. R. Tavener. They have now shown their affection for his memory by placing in the chapel a portrait suitably inscribed, and also a fine replica of his favourite picture, Watts's 'Sir Galahad.' The latter is the work of the Rev. Lucking Tavener, who obtained permission from Mrs. Watts to make the copy. The pictures were unveiled by the Rev. Dendy Agate, and an address was delivered by the Rev. J. Cyril Flower, a fellow-student of Mr. Tavener's; and a sermon explanatory of the painting was delivered by the Rev. Lucking Tavener. In conclusion, it is a pleasure to offer to the Rev. Stuart Redfern warm congratulations on his recovery from illness.

THE CENTENARY OF THE TREATY OF GHENT.

THE British Committee for the Celebration of the Hundred Years' Peace with America has issued the following statement:—

On Christmas Eve, 1814, in the old Carthusian monastery in the city of Ghent, the plenipotentiaries of Great Britain and the United States signed the Treaty of Ghent, which brought to a close the last war between these great English-speaking peoples. There have been many and grave Anglo-American disputes and difficulties since then, but they have all been dealt with successfully by the machinery of conciliation and arbitration. To-day these two nations can rejoice together over the significant achievement of a completed Century of Peace.

Preparations to mark the Centenary by an impressive series of public ceremonies, and by works of permanent value, have been in progress for some time, under the auspices of representative National Committees in Great Britain, the United States of America, and the Dominion of Canada. One project of the American Committee has recently been accomplished—the compilation and publication of Prof. Dunning's 'History of the Hundred Years' Peace.'

The outbreak of the terrible European War, in which our country has been called to take part in defence of the faith of treaties and of the rights of the smaller and weaker nationalities, has interfered with our projects for the celebration, and compelled a postponement. The noble city of Ghent is in the occupation of a hostile soldiery. Both the Belgian people and ourselves are absorbed in the tasks and sacrifices made necessary by the nature of the struggle to which they are pledged. We must hold over our rejoicings for the blessings of the Hundred Years of British-American Peace until the European War is over.

To-day we can only recall to the public mind with deep thankfulness the century's record of peaceful triumphs which is now completed; and utter the prayer that the peace between the British and American democracies which has so long endured may never be broken, and that the disarmed frontier between the United States and Canada may long continue as an example to the world of the safe defence of mutual respect and trust in the affairs of nations.

The time will soon, we hope, come when we can announce a new timetable for the Celebration of the Hundred Years' Peace, when the story of what the English-speaking peoples have accomplished may bring good cheer and fresh courage to a world exhausted by war.

In the meantime we salute our American cousins with a greeting of goodwill.

SERVICES BY DR. HUNTER.

It has been decided to continue the Sunday Morning Services at the Æolian Hall, New Bond Street, W., conducted by Dr. Hunter. The following passage from The Monthly Calendar, in which Dr. Hunter refers to future arrangements, will be read with interest by those to whom the services have proved both helpful and stimulating:—

"It was decided to commence the Sunday Morning Services in the Æolian Hall in July, before there was any war or rumours of war. After the war broke out, I hesitated as to commencing them, but friends who for years have kept me in kindly remembrance urged me to go on—confident that in this time of distress they would meet a real need. The Services were started simply as an experiment. I have been much encouraged, both by the attendance and by the expressions of appreciation which I have received. It has given me pleasure to hear from friends and strangers that the Sunday hour spent in the beautiful Æolian Hall has been to them good and profitable. I have now been asked to continue these Services permanently—as long, at least, as they are adequately supported and I am able to do it. I have enjoyed, I need hardly say, preaching in this quiet way, and am grateful for the opportunity of giving my message with the minimum of fatigue and without the burden of an organization. I have very willingly agreed to go on conducting these Services—with the simple desire and purpose of reaching the lives of men and women, and of bringing them some real help and comfort."

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.

DR. J. E. CARPENTER retires from Manchester College at the end of the current session. Dr. L. P. Jacks has been appointed to succeed him as Principal. The Rev. Henry Gow (of Hampstead) has been appointed Tutor in New Testament and Related Studies. He will continue as minister of Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead, devoting part of his time to the College, residing in Oxford for the purpose for part of the week during Term.

A GREETING FROM INDIA.

We have received the following message of greeting from Prof. T. L. Vaswani of the Dyal Singh College, Lahore:—

"I trust it is well with you and yours. This grim and growing war makes one anxious for sisters and brothers within the danger zone. Now as ever we all subsist by the Love of the Adorable One. Every human heart is a jewel of the All-Love: how sad that so many human hearts are distressed at this time! May the tragedy and tears of the nation pass away soon—soon! May the prayer for the Peace of the Nations whom the Christ still loves flow as a fountain to the All-Father! May the Lotus-eyed Lord bless the Mighty Mother England, and so may beloved India's sacrifice on the altar of the Empire and its Crowned Head be accepted in the White Holy Asrama of the Shining Ones for the healing of the Nations of the World!"

It is announced that the Rev. H. S. McClelland, of the Congregational Church, East Finchley, has accepted an invitation to Trinity Church, Glasgow, in succession to Dr. John Hunter.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Aberystwyth.—Men in khaki are already putting in appearance as worshippers at New Street Meeting-house. As the troops—many thousands in number—now quartered in this town include the Cheshires, there are probably several lads amongst them from our congregations in that county. It would be very helpful if ministers, parents, and friends would at once send names and billet addresses to our Secretary, D. J. Davies, Ph.D., 16, Cambrian Place. A town's committee representative of the places of worship has been formed to work with the Y.M.C.A. in the all-important matter of nightly entertainment, games, reading- and writing-rooms. The congregation at New Street is actively represented by Miss C. Powell Evans and Mr. Emil Evans, with twelve other ladies and gentlemen to assist in turns at the refreshment, stationery, and postal counters in the Rink, which has been made over for the time by the Mayor and Corporation to the Committee.

Birmingham, Moseley.—Mr. Stanley R. Gibbon of Tamworth having accepted the invitation of the Moseley Congregation, will begin his ministry on Sunday, January 3, 1915.

Dukinfield.—The congregation of the Old Chapel, Dukinfield, has sustained a most serious loss by the death of Mr. Edwin Bennett Broadrick, which occurred with tragic suddenness on Christmas morning. He arose apparently in his usual health, but whilst waiting for breakfast suddenly fell back and expired in a few minutes. He had been Secretary of the Old Chapel for twenty-six years, followed by six years as Chapel Warden, besides having been a teacher for many years, and a Director for more than a dozen, at the Sunday School. Mr. Broadrick was born in Dukinfield seventy-five years ago, his father having also been a member of the Old Chapel Committee, and a teacher and director at the Sunday School for forty years. He was also a member of long standing of the Committees of the East Cheshire Christian Union and the North Cheshire Unitarian Sunday School Union, of both of which he had occupied the position of President. On the former Committee he was appointed thirty-eight years ago, on the death of his father. He was also on the Committee of the Manchester District Sunday School Association. Mr. Broadrick was elected a member of the Village Library Committee in 1864, and Secretary in 1865. In 1870, on the formation of a Science and Art Committee, he became Secretary to that also. These positions he held until the institution was taken over by the Corporation in 1895, when he was appointed Librarian and Secretary to the Technical Instruction Committee, afterwards the Higher Education Committee—appointments which he held at the time of his death. The funeral was conducted on Tuesday afternoon by the Rev. E. Gwilym Evans at the Old Chapel before a very large congregation, amongst whom were representatives from the Corporation, borough officials, the three associations named above, and almost the whole of the Chapel Committee.

Liscard.—The Red Cross workers in connection with the Memorial Church have accomplished a large amount of useful work, and parcels of clothes for the wounded have been sent to various institutions. Great interest has also been taken by members of the congregation in work for the Belgian refugees.

London, Essex Church.—The Church Committee has expressed the thanks of the congregation to the Rev. A. Hurn for the successful work which he has done, both in the pulpit and in the Church institutions, during the seven months he has acted as Junior Minister at Essex Church. The Rev. J. H. Weatherall enters upon the ministry of the Church on January 3, on which day the usual Communion Service will be held after Morning Service.

London: Hackney.—The close of the school year was marked on Sunday, December 20, by the distribution of the prizes by Mrs. J. Arthur Pearson. Amongst other events of the autumn have been a series of lectures by Mrs. Lister on 'Historic London,' and others on 'Russia and the War,' by Dr. David Soskice; 'Japan,' by Mr. B. J. Wilden-Hart, M.A.; and 'The River Lea,' by Mr. James Cox, at all of which collections were taken for the National Relief Fund. There has also been a concert in aid of the Church Poor Fund and the National Relief Fund. The collections at the lectures amounted to £3 4s. 10d., and the concert produced £5 5s.

Manchester: Lower Mosley Street Schools.—A Committee has been formed by a few friends of Mr. Henry Hyde—for so many years an active worker in connection with the Lower Mosley Street Sunday Schools—with the purpose of raising a sum of money to relieve him and Mrs. Hyde of the inevitable pecuniary anxieties attendant upon advancing years. Mr. Hyde is now entering upon his 73rd year, and it is felt that many will be wishful to show, by contributing to this fund, their high appreciation of his life's work in the promotion of Natural Science, and to recognize his constant efforts for the betterment of his fellows. He was for a long period of years the life and soul of the Lower Mosley Street Schools' Natural History Society, founded by the late Dr. Alcock, a society which did excellent work throughout its career in fostering the study of Nature, especially in the domains of botany, geology, and zoology. He was also closely connected with the work of the Manchester Microscopical Society and other societies of similar aims, and for more than forty years he has been actively engaged in teaching the sciences to which he has devoted his life, in the classroom and the field, and has gained the friendly esteem of many ardent students. Mr. Hyde was Superintendent of the Lower Mosley Street Sunday Schools for twenty years, and in the capacity of sick visitor, and as the holder of numerous offices, he won the warmest admiration by the self-devotion with which he met all calls on his time and energy. As a lay-preacher also he has rendered considerable service to the small and remote congregations. Contributions may be sent to the Treasurer, Mr. A. Ernest Steinthal, Lower Mosley Street Schools, Manchester.

Nottage.—At a social gathering held on Christmas Day a presentation of a silver inkstand was made to the Rev. W. J. Phillips, C.C., who has ministered to the Church for upwards of twenty-five years. Mr. Wm. J. Williams, in making the presentation on behalf of the members of the Church and Sunday School, spoke of the faithful services rendered by Mr. Phillips during his long ministry, while reference was also made to the efficient way in which he had thrown himself into the social and civic life of the town, and to the high esteem in which he was held generally. Mr. T. Gammon, Superintendent, referred to the devoted attachment of their minister to the Sunday School and its work. Mr. Sidney Phillips and Mr. Roderick Evans (Inspector N.S.P.C.C., Brecon), and a former member of the Church, also spoke a few appreciative words. Mr. Phillips made a brief reply for the gift, which he accepted as a symbol of their affection.

Tenterden.—On Christmas Day the Old Meeting House and its schoolroom were used by Catholics. The Red Cross Society and the Refugee Committee were anxious that their several charges, including a number of wounded Belgian soldiers, should attend Mass on Christmas Day, and there being no Catholic chapel within ten miles, the Old Meeting House and schoolroom were placed at their disposal. The schoolroom, being structurally more convenient than the Meeting House, was transformed into a Catholic chapel, and there Mass was said and the communion administered, while confessions were heard in the minister's vestry. The officiating priest was the Abbé J. Sas of Malines, himself a Belgian Refugee.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

THE OLDEST LIVING NEWSPAPER IN AMERICA.

Referring to our recent notes on the 150th anniversary of the Hartford (U.S.A.) Daily Courant, a correspondent from Philadelphia points out that we were in error in stating that this is the oldest living newspaper in America. The Courant, we understand, is the oldest living daily paper, but the oldest living newspaper is the Newport (Rhode Island) Mercury, a weekly, which was established in 1758, six years before the Courant was born, and has had a prosperous existence ever since.

IN MEMORY OF MARGARET MACDONALD.

The delightful bronze group of laughing children which was exhibited at the Royal Academy this summer, and which is the gift of women's societies all over the world in recognition of Margaret Macdonald's noble work, has now been placed in Lincoln's Inn Fields, where it will bring an impulse of joy to the heart of many a tired worker. The memorial bears the following inscription:—"She was the daughter of John and Margaret Gladstone. She was born in Kensington in 1870, was married to J. Ramsay Macdonald in 1896, and lived with him at 3, Lincoln's Inn Fields. Here her children were born, and here she died in 1911. She brought joy to others with whom and for whom she lived and worked. Her heart went out in fellowship to her fellow-women and in love to the children of the people whom she served as a citizen and helped as a sister. She quickened zeal and faith in others by her life and took no rest from doing good."

WYCLIFFE AND THE BIBLE.

"The Sacred Scriptures," said John Wycliffe, who died on December 31, 1384, "are the property of the people, and one which no one should be allowed to wrest from them.... I pray with all my heart that through doing the things contained in this book we may all together come to the everlasting life." This democratic religious attitude was Wycliffe's greatest crime in the eyes of the ecclesiastics of his day, and the Church showed its displeasure by excommunicating him. It is curious to read the complaints of the chronicler who declares that he made the Scriptures, by translating them into the English tongue, "common and more open to laymen and women than it was wont to be to clerks well learned and of good understanding, so that the pearl of the Gospel is trodden underfoot of swine." A monkish writer, commenting on the fatal attack of palsy which seized Wycliffe on the last Sunday of the old year before the altar of Lutterworth, uses much stronger language, and calls the venerable old priest "the image of hypocrites, the restorer of schism, the storehouse of lies, the sink of flattery," finishing up by saying that the seizure which ended his life plainly showed "that the curse which God had thundered forth against Cain was also inflicted on him." In spite of anathemas Wycliffe's Bible had a wide circulation. It is recorded that those who could not get access to it in its complete form would pay a considerable sum for a few sheets, sometimes a load of hay being offered for permission to read it for an hour.

DR. BOSE IN AMERICA.

Prof. J. C. Bose, of the University of Calcutta, who has achieved a world-wide reputation as a scientist, is visiting America for the second time, and during the present winter will lecture before various scientific bodies and at Columbia, Chicago, Wisconsin, and other universities. Dr. Bose has been in Europe since last April, and was about to start for Germany on a lecturing engagement when war broke out. His researches and experiments have led to an almost startling demonstration of the unity of all life. He is deeply interested in religion, especially in the Brahmo Samaj, of which he is a member. Mrs. Bose belongs to one of the most influential families in Calcutta, and is herself a leader in Brahmo circles. The success of the Brahmo Girls' School in that city is, indeed, very largely due to her. On her former visit to America she made an extensive study of educational, social, and religious thought and methods in that country, with a view to turning the knowledge to practical use in India; and we learn from The Christian Register that it has long been her dream to see some arrangement made by which a succession of Brahmo women students may be enabled to go to the United States and receive training as teachers. On their return to their own country they would become leaders in the much-needed education of girls and young women there, and confer upon India, so Mrs. Bose believes, the greatest of all blessings.

THE CHILD AND THE PUPPY.

At the British Hospital at Furnes, Sir Frederick Treves, who has just reported on his tour of inspection among the Red Cross Hospitals in Western France, saw a little boy "in a bed very much too big for him," a refugee from Ypres. "In one of the many attacks made upon that unfortunate place," he says, "his foot was smashed by a shell, and as a result the limb had to be amputated. What has happened to his parents is not known. He is probably alone in the world. In a basket on the floor by the child's bed is another refugee from Ypres—a puppy of very indefinite breed. He was probably thrown by some compassionate soul into a cart which was flying in haste from the burning town. He is little more than a round woolly ball—woolly by reason of his extreme youth, and round as the result of persistent over-rationing. It is a curious picture—the whitewashed refectory full of gravely wounded men, some still groaning with pain, some nearing death, with high upon the wall a kindly statue of the Virgin looking down upon the scene, and in the centre of the room, near the stove, the ridiculous puppy and the one-legged boy."

AMERICA AND THE WOUNDED.

We all know by this time what generous and prompt action America is capable of when her sympathies are awakened, and every one of the belligerent countries owes her an immense debt of gratitude for the comfort and succour which she has brought to soldiers and non-combatants suffering from the ravages of war. The Red Cross Hospital ship and the American Ambulance of Paris, both of which are international charities for the relief of sufferers without distinction, were organized with amazing rapidity and efficiency, and now Mr. Henry James has been using his pen in praise of the American Volunteer Motor Ambulance Corps, organized by Mr. Richard Norton of Boston. He has himself seen something of the work it has been doing in France with the aid of "the general educated intelligence, the cultivated tradition of tact," which have greatly added to its usefulness, and he describes it with enthusiasm. "We Americans," Mr. James says truly, "are as little neutrals as possible where any aptitude for any action, of whatever kind, that affirms life and freshly and inventively exemplifies it, instead of overwhelming and undermining it, is concerned."

AN EDUCATIONAL CONFERENCE.

The announcement that the annual Conference of Educational Associations will meet on January 4, and continue for a week, strikes a welcome note in the midst of the general preoccupation with War topics. Twenty-six societies are represented on the Committee this year, and a large attendance is expected. Bishop Welldon will deliver the opening address on 'Principles of Educational Science,' Canon J. R. B. Masterman will deliver the presidential address of the Teachers' Guild of Great Britain and Ireland, and Mr. T. Edmund Harvey, M.P., that of the Friends' Guild of Teachers. The Simplified Spelling Society will hold its session on the same day, Prof. Gilbert Murray in the chair.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

LAST Sunday was observed as a day of Intercession on behalf of the Nation and Empire in this time of war. A solemn act of worship of this kind does not lend itself to words of ordinary comment. It is a time, not for eloquent speech or striking argument by the orators of the pulpit, but for simple fellowship in prayer and deep searching of heart. It was in this spirit of quiet waiting upon God that the day was kept in thousands of churches. There was no tone of boastfulness about it, no rejoicing over our enemies, no vain-glorious forgetfulness of the common spiritual nature which unites all men of every kindred and tongue and nation as children of the one Father in Heaven. We do not cease to be His children when we quarrel among ourselves. In moments of recollection His love for us is still the deepest and most precious thing in life. He does not forget us. It is we who forget Him. Here is the reason why we should pray for one another in our poverty and distress, and stir up our hearts by way of remembrance.

THE special Form of Prayer issued under the authority of the Archbishops of Canterbury and York was marked by the breadth of its sympathy and the simplicity and directness of its tone. It escaped from the bonds of mere formality, which has marked a good many modern additions to the liturgy, and gave voice to something universal in the religion of the whole country. Prayers were included for those who fight against us, conceived in a truly Christian spirit. The following words, taken from the introductory exhortation, illustrate admirably what we may venture to call the spiritual emphasis of the whole service:—

Coming thus humbly and thankfully to our faithful God and merciful Father, we shall not seek first the things that are for our private advantage, but the things which will be for the advancement of His kingdom. We shall entreat Him to grant that out of the confusions and miseries of the war there may arise a clearer perception of the true relation between right and might, and a fuller apprehension of the Gospel of Christ as it bears upon the fellowship of nations. We shall have no desire to see our enemies crushed merely for the sake of their humiliation. We shall wish for them, as for ourselves, that their eyes may be opened to know what is true; and we shall pray that the day may come, by the mercy of God, when we may learn to understand and respect one another, and may be united as friends to pursue the common good. And above all we shall pray that when the longed-for peace arrives we may be filled with the determination to wipe out the bitter memory of our strifes and contentions by setting ourselves afresh, as men of goodwill, to the supreme task of leading the peoples of the world to the true knowledge and obedience of the only Deliverer and Master of us all.

THE chief business of the Departmental Committee appointed to consider questions affecting the welfare of Belgian refugees in this country has been the problem of unemployment, and their report, which some people will regard as over-cautious in tone, shows that an earnest attempt is being made to grapple with it. Their recommendations, so far as the ordinary labour market is concerned, are based upon two main principles: (1) That no Belgian labour should be employed until every reasonable effort has been made to find British labour through the agency of the labour exchanges. (2) That no Belgian labour should be employed at rates of wages lower, or on conditions less favourable, than those generally observed in the district. In regard to the latter principle enlightened public opinion will be unanimous. It is a necessary safeguard against the unscrupulous employer, who wishes to turn the disasters of the war to his own advantage. It is not, however, quite so clear that it is desirable to put as many obstacles as possible in the way of the Belgian refugee, who desires to work for his living in this country. This policy, if it is followed in a doctrinaire spirit, may degenerate into a temper of narrow nationalism, too timid where the economic interests of our own people are concerned to risk anything in order to provide the refugees with what they chiefly need, the opportunity of profitable labour.

WE are glad to have the support of Mr. Seebohm Rowntree in this line of criticism. He evidently agrees that if the purely economic argument is pushed too hard, and we forget the wholly exceptional nature of the problem with which we have to deal, we may create difficulties even greater than those which we are anxious to avoid. In an interview, which appeared in The Manchester Guardian last week, he criticized in the following terms the provision that Belgians are not to be employed if there are any British workmen capable of doing the job:—

It is very important [he says] to emphasize what this means. If it were really enforced that no Belgian could be engaged until no British workman could be found, it would mean that sooner than run the risk of a British workman being out of work for a few days—because in view of the great number enlisting the demand for labour is very great, except in Lancashire and a few other places—you practically condemn almost every Belgian to remain unemployed indefinitely. The penalty placed upon the Belgians would be frightfully heavy, and at the end of the war we should send back these 20,000 men demoralized as the result of compulsory unemployment over a long period. Supposing that some of them were paid below the trade-union rate, it would be undesirable, but it would not be a very crying evil. As we have offered the Belgians hospitality, it is not, from their point of view, a question of saying: "Accept that wage or starve." The Belgian would probably say that it would be better for him to be working at a low figure than not at all. You must also remember that many cases of under-payment among Belgians would be quickly noised abroad and would be very unpopular. What is really important is that the refugee committees should take all possible steps to find work for their people by watching advertisements in the papers, and so on. The demoralization resulting from unemployment is so certain and rapid that it must be obviated by any possible means, and after what Belgium has done for the Allies less than that can hardly be expected at our hands.

THE arrest of Cardinal Mercier on account of the outspoken language of his pastoral letter to the people of Belgium on 'Patriotism and Endurance' is a bad blunder which will injure his gaolers more than himself. International sympathy among Roman Catholics is still very sensitive, especially where the higher ranks of the hierarchy are concerned. The action shows how little the virtue of magnanimity enters into the German art of government. It is a fatal political blunder to regard all strong speech as necessarily seditious. Cardinal Mercier denies that the State is omnipotent, and that civil Right is the creation of absolute power. "Civil right," he says, "is Peace, that is to say the ordered life of the nation based on Justice. Indeed, Justice itself is only absolute because it is the expression of the essential concord of men with God among themselves." Words like these are anathema to Prussian autocracy, and Cardinal Mercier is not slow to apply them to the spiritual struggle in which his people are engaged. "Is there a single patriot," he asks, "who does not feel that glory has come to Belgium? Which of us would have the courage to tear out the last page of our history? Which of us can look without pride on the splendour of the glory which our murdered country has won?"

BUT this brave Pastoral closes with wise and dignified words of appeasement. Cardinal Mercier tells the people plainly that in the secrecy of their own hearts they owe the German invader neither esteem, nor affection, nor obedience; but he reminds the distracted civilian population that in the occupied part of the country they live under conditions to which they should loyally submit. It is the army alone which has the honour of the country under its protection, and is charged with national defence. "Towards those who rule our country by military force," he says in conclusion, "and who, deep down in their consciences, are compelled to admire the chivalrous resolution with which we have defended and defend our independence, let us behave ourselves as the public interest demands. Many of them declare that they are willing to-day, to the best of their ability, to lessen our trials and to help us to recover at least a portion of our normal public life. Let us respect the rules which they impose so long as they do not transgress our Christian consciences or our national dignity. Let us not behave as though bravado was courage or tumult gallantry." A military governor with an ounce of common sense knows that he cannot kill patriotism or coerce affection. His business is to command obedience and to prevent turbulence in the civil population. In this stern business Cardinal Mercier was his best ally.

OUR educational leaders have set us an admirable example by holding their Christmas vacation conferences as usual. The subject of the war has necessarily dominated the proceedings; the national upheaval will leave nothing untouched, and the work and outlook of the schools must be profoundly affected. In recent years there has been a steady drift of opinion in some influential quarters in the direction of more rigid organization and greater uniformity of plan—due, perhaps, to a rather blind worship of German efficiency. In his Presidential Address to the Teachers' Guild, on Tuesday, Canon Masterman pleaded that the work of teaching must involve the full expression of individuality. A healthy belief in voluntary association, he said, was one of the most valuable of our national characteristics, and, unless he misread the signs of the times, we were at the beginning of a reaction against the tendency to displace the spontaneous initiative of voluntary organization by the cast-iron regulation of State-made uniformity. Their main work was not with questions of stipend and regulation, but with ideals and methods. Touching on the problem of the place of religion in the school, he pointed out that over sectarian controversies there was already dawning the light of a nobler conception of the meaning of religion in national life.

At the Head Masters' Conference there was an important debate on the place of military training in secondary schools. The Head Master of Haileybury moved the following resolution: "That in the opinion of this Association, instruction in military drill and the use of the rifle should form part of the education of all boys in secondary schools." To this Mr. J. L. Paton, of the Manchester Grammar School, moved an amendment making it applicable "if and so long as the Government calls upon secondary schools to undertake this work." In doing so he pointed out that the presence of training corps in their schools was due to the German menace, and warned the members of the Conference that, by passing the resolution, they would be doing their best to perpetuate in English schools a system the horrors of which were obvious to everybody at the present day. A further amendment was moved in the following terms: "That it is inopportune, and contrary to the spirit and genius of a free people and a great democracy, to desire to make the instruction in military drill and the use of the rifle compulsory for all boys in secondary schools." Both amendments were lost, and the resolution was carried.

* * *

In a letter to The Times on New Year's Day, Mr. Alexander Nairne has made us his debtor by the following lines, which he has translated and slightly adapted from the 'Pax' of Aristophanes:—

O Thou that makest wars to cease in all the world,
In accordance with Thine ancient name,
we beseech Thee,
Make war and tumult now to cease.
From the murmur and the subtlety of suspicion with which we vex one another Give us rest.
Make a new beginning,
And mingle again the kindred of the nations in the alchemy of Love.
And with some finer essence of forbearance and forgiveness Temper our mind.

HELP FOR THE BELGIAN WOUNDED.

THE word which we wish to address to our readers this week shall be short and practical. It is well to keep our eyes fixed on the vision of peace, and even amid the clash of arms to cultivate the temper and disposition which will enable us to build wisely when the time comes to repair the ravages of war. But with our visions we must never become visionaries. We serve the future best when we face the duty or the need of the moment in a brave and generous spirit. When our neighbour lies wounded and half dead the one thing to do is to pour in the oil and wine, and to take care of him. A complete Christianity will not, indeed, forget the claims of the priest and the Levite and the thieves upon our pity and forgiveness. They stand in sore need of spiritual succour. But it is the wounded man who must be tended first, and his claim upon us is for undivided attention to the limit of our strength.

We have been oppressed for many weeks by our impotence to touch the tragedy of Belgium with more than the tips of our fingers. We have welcomed her refugees to our homes. We know that our soldiers are fighting side by side with hers in the same cause. We have vowed that handsome restitution to her for all the wrong which she has suffered must be a first condition of any peace which we can accept. But what are we doing more than this, to cope with the miseries of her starving population, or to give strength and hope to her fighting men, deprived as they are of the charitable kindness which goes forth so lavishly from thousands of homes in our own country? The iron heel of the conqueror is heavy upon the land. The delicate fabric of its social relationships has been trodden under foot, and all the channels by which thought and business enterprise and organized help were wont to circulate are utterly destroyed. The problem is so gigantic in its misery and terror, it is so far beyond anything of which we have had previous experience, that we hardly dare to look it in the face.

In a mood like this we must seek for salvation, alike for ourselves and for those who need our help, in some urgent practical task. The one thing that we can do that we ought to do heartily; and if it is in some corner of the field where the helpers are few, we can accept our duty, however humble it may be, with a sense of glorious privilege. Our readers have taken a large and generous share in the various schemes of public help which have been called into existence by the war; but we have been waiting anxiously for the moment when we could commend some branch of service to their special care. It is accordingly with a feeling akin to relief that we publish a letter, based on first hand and very recent knowledge, from Mrs. Bernard Allen on the urgent needs of the hospitals for the Belgian wounded. Her tribute to the splendid equipment of the British base hospitals, while it is a source of legitimate pride, only throws up the necessities of Belgium into sharper relief. Here are men who have borne the acutest miseries of the war with noble courage, and they lack elementary comforts while they are suffering in hospital, and clothing to keep them warm when they return to the trenches, because all their natural sources of supply are in the hands of the enemy. In the hospital, to which special reference is made in Mrs. Allen's letter, the need of clothing and comforts is very urgent, and supplies can be sent as they are forthcoming. Why should not our readers keep this and one or two other Belgian hospitals adequately supplied? Let the women give their work and the men their money. Let them annex this special corner of the field for their own tillage without slackening their efforts in other directions. All contributions should be sent with as little delay as possible to Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.

In the hospital in question there is a wounded Belgian soldier. He told an English visitor the other day that when he was first wounded he was sent to England, and for five weeks he was a rich man, everybody was so kind to him. Now he has been sent back from the front a second time, but under very different conditions in this hospital which has been extemporized in a chapel, where the medicines are kept on the pulpit stairs, and the bedclothes are too scanty to keep out the cold. It is in our power to make this soldier and his comrades rich men, rich in the knowledge that across the seas there are people who care while they suffer, and will do much to ease their pain and to cure them of their wounds, and to send them forth with new heart to fight again for their country. Who will give? Who will give quickly?

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

IT was natural that many meetings and conferences should be postponed during the first weeks of the War. For this reason the Church Congress was not held. But the corporate life of the country cannot go on indefinitely in this state of suspended animation. The time has come when all arrangements for postponement should be reconsidered. This applies especially to the various congresses of the religious bodies like the National Conference of Unitarian and other Liberal Christian Churches, which has cancelled its meetings, which had been fixed for next April. The place may have to be altered and the usual arrangements modified. The proceedings might well be shorter, and all hospitality ought to be very simple and inexpensive. But that any fellowship of Christian churches should obliterate its common life, because we are at war, is like a confession that it has no urgent religious business on hand and nothing to contribute to the national life at a time of grave spiritual need. We do not write in any captious or critical spirit, but we shall be glad to have some expression of opinion from our readers on the subject. It is wise to modify our social habits where they are expensive or inconvenient. But is it well to regard a great occasion of religious fellowship as one of the pleasures we can do without? What of the duty of taking counsel together upon the new tasks which await us? What of the possibility in the high emotions of the hour of sealing the compact of a closer and more effective union?

Good Thoughts for Ebil Times.

I WAS early convinced that true religion consisted in an inward life, wherein the heart doth love and reverence God, the Creator, and learns to exercise true justice and goodness, not only toward all men, but also toward the brute creatures; that, as the mind was moved by an inward principle to love God, as an invisible, incomprehensible Being, so by the same principle it was moved to love him in all his manifestations in the visible world; that, as by His breath the flame of life was kindled in all animal, sensible creatures, to say we love God as unseen, and at the same time exercise cruelty toward the least creature moving by his life, or by life derived from him, was a contradiction in itself.

JOHN WOOLMAN.

I FOUND no narrowness respecting sects and opinions, but believed that sincere, upright-hearted people, in every society, who truly love God, were accepted of him. As I lived under the Cross, and simply followed the opening of truth, my mind from day to day was more enlightened.... I looked upon the works of God in this visible creation, and an awfulness covered me. My heart was tender and often contrite, and universal love to my fellow-creatures increased in me.

JOHN WOOLMAN.

If here I may honour my God either by doing or suffering, I shall be most glad. Truly no poor creature hath more cause to put himself forth in the cause of his God than I. I have had plentiful wages beforehand, and I am sure I shall never earn the least mite.

OLIVER CROMWELL.

A SIGHT IN CAMP.

A SIGHT in camp in the daybreak gray and dim,
As from my tent I emerge so early sleepless,
As slow I walk in the cool fresh air the path near by the hospital tent,
Three forms I see on stretchers lying, brought out there untended lying,
Over each the blanket spread, ample brownish woollen blanket,
Gray and heavy blanket, folding, covering all.

Curious I halt and silent stand, Then with light fingers I from the face of the nearest the first just lift the blanket;

Who are you elderly man so gaunt and grim, with well-gray'd hair, and flesh all sunken about the eyes?

Who are you, my dear comrade?

Then to the second I step—and who are you,
my child and darling?

Who are you, sweet boy, with cheeks yet blooming?

Then to the third—a face nor child nor old,
very calm, as of beautiful yellow-white ivory;

Young man, I think I know you—I think this face is the face of the Christ Himself,

Dead and divine and brother of all, and here again he lies.

WALT WHITMAN.

ARISE, O Lord, Who judgest the earth; and as Thou dwellest in and possessest the faith of all nations, suffer us not to abide in darkness; and grant that we may not lay the foundations of our faith on the sand where the whirlwind may overthrow them, but be established on the rock which is steadfast in Thee. Amen.

[Mozarabic Liturgy.]

O GOD, Who art Peace everlasting, Whose chosen reward is the gift of peace, and Who hast taught us that the peace-makers are Thy children, pour Thy peace into our souls, that everything discordant may utterly vanish, and all that makes for peace be sweet to us for ever. Amen.

[Mozarabic Liturgy.]

AD-TIRONEM, MCMXIV.

(From The Willaston School Chronicle.)

Do you remember, not so long ago,
How Someone's little breast was filled with pride

When in the Chronicle's pages he espied
His name under "Tirones"? And that flow

Of coursing blood that set you all aglow
When, on a later day, you saw your name Enrolled, with many a mark of well-earned fame,

Among the Emeriti? Then be it so
To-day, when England's need reveals you thus,

Again a Tiro. May the pride of yore Return in all its fullness, till once more:
(The peril overpast, the victory won)
Upon the roll you stand Emeritus— Discharged with honour, for your duty done!

A MASTER IN THE UNSEEN WORLD.

To pass from the turmoil and strife of our Western World to that serene contemplative life of the East, where the soul becomes one with Brahma, and life in Him fulfils, or eliminates, all desire, is sometimes a quite priceless experience, even for the busiest of us. It may not convert us into seers or mystics, or even allure us to envy those grave, meditative beings who muse in the hot valleys and the hill solitudes of India. But it may hush for a while the tumult of our strivings, and, in the pauses of our struggle with or for "things of the world," make us more keenly aware of that Something More which broods over this visible scene of conflict and haunts the recesses of our own minds—a presence of mysterious, all-pervading life and beauty and joy.

For there is in the contemplative man, the true visionary or seer, a kind of unassuming ascendancy that awes and subdues, or, as some would say, imposes on us. He seems to be judging, almost rebuking us, there in his tranquil repudiation of the prizes of the world, although he is conscious of no such purpose or desire, and utters no word of judgment. We may defeat, or even crush him, by intellectual or physical strength; we may conquer by force of arms the country which so easily produces many such as he—as a handful of English soldiers once added the Empire of India to the British Crown. But in our hushed and thoughtful moods the suspicion haunts us that he is victorious still. Somehow, the "meek" do "inherit the earth," the "pure in heart see God," the "spiritual man judgeth all things, though he himself is judged of no man."

To open a book wherein one of the great contemplative souls has revealed the conflicts, the triumphs and the failures of his inmost life, is to be made conscious of this authority or mastery of the unseen world which, to him, is so real and sacred and sufficing. To read, in days of anguish, while the fury of military strife is raging over Europe, the Autobiography of Devendranath Tagore is an experience of extraordinary interest and value. And coming into our hands just now it could not fail to recall those wonderful lines of Matthew Arnold, albeit written with reference to a remote and very different aspect of the conflict between the forces of violence and the powers of the spirit:—

The brooding East with awe beheld
Her impious younger world.
The Roman tempest swell'd and swell'd
And on her head was hurled.

The East bowed low before the blast,
In patient deep disdain:
*She let the legions thunder past
And plunged in thought again.*

The dispute concerning the relative value of the contemplative and the active life is a very old and somewhat vain dispute. It comes of trying to confine our ideas of action to the performance of material and visible labours, the putting forth of physical energy, or the exercise of faculty in relation to such; as if contemplation were a form of inactivity, as if action took place only in the world apprehended by the senses and under the dominion of laws pertaining to matter alone. But the record of spiritual struggle set forth in this 'Autobiography' reveals the character of a man of immense energy, of eager, intense purpose, though strangely indifferent to worldly possessions, almost disdainful of material wealth and power.

The Autobiography of Maharshi Devendranath Tagore. Translated by his son, Satyendranath Tagore, and Indira Devi. With an Introduction by Evelyn Underhill. London: Macmillan & Co. 7s. 6d. net.

Devendranath Tagore was born and brought up in the household of a rich and powerful Calcutta merchant. Luxury surrounded him on every side from childhood. Moreover, he was the eldest son, and as such expected to take a prominent place in the pomp of festive occasions, the entertainment of high officials, and in high caste Brâhmanic religious ceremonies. He performed his duties in these functions—so far as, and so long as, he could bring himself to submit to his father's will in relation to them—but always as one whose mind was centred in other things, and to whom these were trivial and unimportant. And for the religious festivals, in which the accustomed Hindu ceremonials were observed, and offerings made to the deified image, or form-embodied deity—these having now become idolatrous to him—he declined to shirk his convictions, or to sear his conscience with rites that he recognized as meaningless and false.

For the call had come to him, in the years of early manhood, to escape from a life of luxury in material things and of soulless formalism in things of religion. To know and worship Brahma as the pure divine spirit of the world, and to build up a church (or sabha or samaj) of those devoted to this knowledge and worship, was the persistent aim of his long, devout, strenuous life. By intense and prolonged meditation he attained to the assurance and realization of a Spiritual Reality abiding within, yet ever transcending, the forms and appearances of sense perception; and then, by unwearied devotion to the Brâhma-Samaj, founded in his boyhood by Rammohan Roy, he sought to share with others, and promote among his own people, the religious ideals which had brought to him freedom and joy and unchallengeable peace.

The record of high spiritual adventure and achievement, as given us here in such frankness and simplicity, must be read throughout, and with receptive, unprejudiced mind, if we would understand and appreciate its significance for the life of the spirit to-day. No summary of it by another hand could avail to indicate its depth and richness of feeling and experience. The story of the first forty years is written by Devendranath Tagore himself. That of its remaining forty-eight years is told briefly, in an Introductory Chapter, by his son, Satyendranath, who with the aid of his daughter, Indira Devi, translates the original Bengali narrative into excellent English. An Introduction by Miss Evelyn Underhill contributes much interesting matter, showing the unconscious, but very intimate connection between this great Indian mystic and some of the Christian mystics of the West. For himself Devendranath had little sympathy with Christianity, as revealed to him by its adherents in his own country, or even with the Christian Scriptures. Probably his repudiation of the doctrine of incarnation, in all its forms, accounted for this, in part. His conception of Brahma was purely spiritual, and to think of Him as incarnate in any visible form or human personality was an offence, savouring of that idolatrous system against which his whole being revolted. Yet the ethics of Jesus himself, had he studied them apart from all perversions, in theology or in the practice of the church, would have intimately harmonized with his own. One might quote sayings of his singularly coincident with many in the New Testament.

The Autobiography and the Introductory Chapter by the translator have much to tell of his labours in connection with the Brâhma-Samaj. But the deeper interest of the Autobiography itself is in the spontaneous and vivid self-revelations, the simple record of spiritual struggles, of prolonged reveries, of sorrows in solitude among men, of triumphs in lonely wanderings among the hills and forests and along the great river shores. It will, indeed, be strange to some that one whose home was so naturally in the spiritual world should be so deeply concerned with the externals of religion, with regular and frequent meetings for the worship of Brahma, and even with the theology of his church. And he is very concerned about this last. The Upanishads were sacred books to him; he learned Sanskrit that he might read them in their primal freshness and purity. And when he found them expressing his own faith, he would claim for them an inspired authority, and some of their texts found a place in his creed and the Brâhmanic ceremonials, dangerously akin to that of the idols from which he had revolted. "I drew up," he says, "a declaration of faith for initiation into the Brâhma Dharma (a sort of inner circle of the Brâhma-Samaj), which contained a clause to the effect that daily worship was to be performed by means of the Gayatri Mantra (the usual text for meditation prescribed for Brâhmins). "The three vyahritis (the first three words of the Gayatri), i.e., bhurbhuva svaha, preceded by the word Om, and the tripartite Gayatri, these are the doors leading to the attainment of Brahma." Surely this is formalism invading! Yet wherever in those same sacred writings he found teachings that savoured of Monism or Pantheism, he would repudiate or modify them, so that his own beloved Mono-theism should suffer no loss, or the faith of his weaker brethren be defiled. He was somewhat of an autocrat in the little community where he was so easily first and strongest.

But it is when he is alone and telling of his own inmost life that his spiritual greatness and charm impress us, and he opens for us the windows of heaven. He was wont to take a yearly holiday from his business and religious duties in Calcutta, to enjoy the great peace amid Nature's vast and holy solitudes; and once he stayed for more than a year at Simla, wandering by day and sometimes by night under the high desolate peaks, in the forests, or along the banks of mountain streams. As a Maharshi, or holy man, he was sought after by the Rajas and Ranas and Gurus of those regions, and sometimes would endure for a while the lavish hospitality of the rich and great, suffering much thereby. Once, after spending a week thus, he hastened away, to recover his soul again, as he climbed upwards through the forest alone to his refuge among the hills.

And here before we take leave of him we may let his own words open his heart to us:—

"I rented a bungalow in a beautiful and quiet spot on the top of a hill, which I liked very much. On that hill top there was only one tree, which became the friend of my solitude.... One day during my wanderings I came upon a path leading through a wooded hill, and immediately began to walk along it, following the impulse of the moment. It was then 4 o'clock in the afternoon. I was so taken up with walking that I went on and on without stopping. One footstep succeeded another, but I was not aware of it. Where I was going, how far I had come, how far I should go—that I did not calculate. After a long time I met a wayfarer, going in the opposite direction. This interrupted the course of my meditation, and I returned to consciousness. I then saw that it was evening and the sun had set.... I turned and walked back quickly, but night gained quickly upon me. Hill, forest, and glade, all were covered with darkness. Like a lamp in that darkness the half-moon accompanied me. No sound was heard on any side, save that of my footsteps crackling on the dry leaves of the path. A solemn feeling was aroused in my breast, together with that of fear. With thrilling heart I saw the eyes of God within that forest. His sleepless gaze was fixed upon me. Those eyes were my guide in this difficult path. Fearless in the midst of many fearsome things, I reached home before 8 o'clock at night. This gaze of His has become rooted indelibly in my heart. Whenever I fall into trouble, I see those eyes of His."

Not long after this, as he stands musing on the bridge of a river swollen to a torrent by the great rains, the call comes to him to return to his work in the valleys below, even as the waters of that stream, here so clear and cool, were hastening downwards to "become defiled and tainted by the dirt and refuse of the earth." (He does not seem to realize that the earth is in itself not less pure than the mountain stream!) "I heard the solemn commandment of the Guide within me: 'Give up thy pride and be lowly like this river. The truth thou hast gained, the devotion and trustfulness thou hast learnt here—go, make them known to the world.' I was startled! Must I then turn back from this holy land of the Himalayas? I had never thought of this." That night no song came to his lips, no sleep to his eyes. But the next morning he prepared to return to his home and his work; for "it was God's command." "The inner command is everything; the outer command is nothing."

Such was the Maharshi, at his highest and greatest. When troubled about his creed as a Monotheist and about the proper shastras, or sacred texts, to be held of supreme authority—when girding at the Monist or Pantheist among his own people or the beliefs of intrusive missionaries, he makes one think of the Wordsworth who wrote the 'Ecclesiastical Sonnets,' as compared with the Wordsworth of the 'Tintern Abbey' lines. In his hours of vision and in the service and sacrifice of daily life, Devendranath is greater than the controversialist and the custodian of sound doctrine and ritual for his Brâhma-Samaj. His real divinity is that One Spirit of Life who, as he says, "Dwellet within and pervadeth the sky, the sun, moon, stars, the air, fire, water, the light and darkness, and ruleth them from within, whose manifestation they are, and yet know Him not, He is the Being that dwells within each of you, as your inner soul." "The worship of God is the food of the soul. Loving Him and doing those deeds which are pleasing in His sight, this, indeed, is His worship." "Through countless ages He is ever the same, the Eternal Now."

He went down from the hills, and for another forty years lived among his fellows the contemplative combined with the active life. When, with his brothers, he had laboured successfully to pay the last rupee of the enormous debts left by their extravagant father, he devoted his whole strength to the cause of that spiritual religion which was so much dearer to his heart than all else that life and the world could offer. He died at the age of 88, repeating often, in those last serene days, the words of his favourite poet Hafiz: "The bell is tolling. I have heard the call, and am ready to depart with all my luggage." HOSPITALS FOR BELGIAN WOUNDED.

AN URGENT APPEAL FOR HELP.

SIR,—I should like to inform your readers of my visit to a place which, in deference to the Censor, I can only say is in the north of France. The town is full of hospitals for our men, and I have never seen such wonderful organization. Each hospital is most perfectly equipped, with its bright wards, its operating theatres, its X-ray rooms, and, above all, with such splendid staffs of doctors and nurses. Again and again I asked: "Is there anything you lack that I can send?" and (except for one matron, who said she wanted some more sleeping suits) they all said the Red Cross and R.A.M.C. stores were so splendid that they had only to ask for what they needed and they had it. Certainly the patients lack for nothing. We must see that the supply is kept up, however, as the need will increase rather than diminish.

But it is a different matter for the Belgian soldiers. There is a voluntary hospital for them at another town nearer the front, in a chapel, where the medicines are kept on the communion table and up the pulpit stairs. There are not enough bedclothes, not enough clothes, no slippers (men who can get up stump about in heavy boots!). Strange to say, they get well, and go back to the trenches short of everything—and they are such good fellows.

I am trying to collect hospital requisites and clothes to send to them. May I appeal to your readers and to working parties connected with the Women's League to send me warm underclothing or gifts of money which can be spent on articles which are absolutely necessary. For patients in hospital the following are required: Night-shirts, dressing-jackets and dressing-gowns, bed-socks, slippers, blankets, bed-linen, sheets, and pillow-cases. For men returning to the front the following articles of clothing are required: Vests, shirts, pants, socks, boots, mufflers, mittens, belts. These are the first requisites, but anything for them which will add to the comfort of hospital life and relieve its tedium will be acceptable.—Yours, &c.

[We commend Mrs. Bernard Allen's appeal most heartily to our readers. Parcels of clothing and gifts of money sent to her at the above address will be acknowledged in our columns. MEMORIAL TO ROBERT COLLYER.

SIR,—A few days ago there was placed on private exhibition in the studio of the artist, Mr. Henry Hering, the clay model of the great high-relief which is to be placed in the Church of the Messiah, New York City, in perpetual memory of Dr. Robert Collyer. If the judgment of the Collyer family, and of such friends and parishioners as have seen the model, is to be trusted, this memorial, when completed in the heroic bronze, will constitute a notable sculptural achievement. Certainly, as a portrait of Dr. Collyer, it is almost startling in its vital reproduction of the great preacher's benignant face, splendid physical proportions, and noble bearing in the pulpit.

In connection with this event, may I take this occasion, on behalf of the Committee in charge, to issue a further appeal for funds for this memorial. Six thousand dollars is the sum required. Of this, a little more than two thousand dollars is now in the hands of the Committee; another two thousand dollars has been pledged, which leaves a final two thousand dollars still to be raised. With the exception of one large gift and fifteen smaller ones, it is to be noted that all the money thus far received and pledged has come from the members of the Church of the Messiah. It is with the desire to have this monument a truly national, indeed international, memorial, and with the confident assurance that Dr. Collyer's friends everywhere will want to have their share in its erection, that this further appeal for funds is issued at this time. Mr. Hering hopes to have the relief ready for unveiling and dedication by Eastertide. Contributions should, therefore, be in the hands of the Treasurer, Mr. William Shillaber, 60, Wall Street, New York City, not later than March or April next.—Yours, &c.,

JOHN HAYNES HOLMES,

Minister of the Church of the Messiah.

MAZZINI AND THE MAKING OF ITALY.

I.

When the old men of to-day were in their cradles, Italy, as we think of it now, did not exist; for, while the greater part of the country was divided up between two kings, a grand duke, three dukes, and the Pope, the fair provinces of Lombardy and Venetia, in the north, were seized by Austria and ruled with despotic severity. The Italians used to say that they could taste Austria in their daily bread. The land that once had been so great and glorious was impotent now that it was divided, while liberty and good government were unknown. Some of the patriotic Italians were thinking of rebellion, and were secretly collecting arms. In course of time three great men appeared, who together succeeded in releasing Italy from her chains, and in welding her into a free and united nation. These three champions were very different, both in themselves and in the parts they had to play. Nor did they always agree. But they all had in view the same sacred end, and for its attainment were prepared to sacrifice everything. They were Mazzini, Cavour, and Garibaldi. A poet has called them the soul, the brain, and the sword of Italy.—Garibaldi the soldier, Cavour the statesman, and Mazzini the prophet and inspirer of the people.

Joseph Mazzini was the son of a doctor, and was born in 1805 at Genoa, the city of Columbus. Proving too sensitive for surgery he took to the study of the law. But it was the great words of the Bible and the poetry of Dante and Byron which set his heart on fire for the service of his fellow-men.

An unsuccessful rising took place when he was a boy, and he was so moved with pity at the sight of the patriots being led away to punishment that he dressed himself in black, a custom he kept up for the rest of his life. Soon he, too, became a conspirator, convinced that it was to her lads and young men that Italy must look, as England looks to-day, to throw off her oppressors and set her free. So, with "God and the People" as his watchword, Mazzini set to work to rouse and marshal Young Italy. But everything had to be done secretly for fear of the police, and even thus suspicion was excited, and he was arrested and placed in the fortress of Savona, the Governor of Genoa telling his father that the boy was too much given to thinking; and "We don't like young people thinking," said he, "without our knowing the subject of their thoughts."

Later on in his career, when in prison again, it comforted Mazzini to watch the stars at night. "I love them like sisters," he said, "and link them to the future in a thousand ways." From his cell at Savona he not only looked out on sea and sky, but discovered, for the first time, the sweet friendship of a little bird which would fly in to him through the gratings. Many years after, when he lived as an exile in London, his linnets and canaries were his inseparable companions. They flew freely about the room, the open window being protected by netting, and while he laboured incessantly with his pen, settled familiarly on his head and shoulders.

To return to Savona. Mazzini was tried for treason, but as he had cleverly destroyed his papers the case against him broke down, and he was acquitted. He retired to Marseilles, and there, with four more devoted young Italians, set up a printing-press, himself doing nearly all the writing, and thence smuggled the journal of Young Italy over the border amongst bales of drapery and packages of sausages. "Climb the hills," urged the leader to his friends, who were ready to risk their lives for their country; "sit at the farmer's table, visit the workshop and the artisans. Tell them of their rightful liberties, their ancient traditions and glories, the old commercial greatness which has gone; talk to them of the thousand forms of oppression, which they are ignorant of because no one points them out." Thousands of brave lads were fired by his enthusiasm, and some were caught and shot. Mazzini himself was in imminent danger, and later on, while still at large, was condemned to death. Once, when the police arrived to search the house in which he was living, he opened the door for them, disguised as the footman. The officer, who happened to be an old schoolfellow of Mazzini, probably saw through the trick, but set his men to search the house and run their swords through the mattresses and the clothes in the wardrobes. None the less, Mazzini's swift and artful movements did so puzzle the police that the people used to sing:—

Where is Mazzini? Ask the pines
Upon the Alps and Apennines.
He is wherever traitors cower
In terror for their fatal hour;
Where'er men wait impatiently
To give their blood for Italy.

And when the pursuit grew too hot he always found a safe retreat in England, amid the London fogs which he grew to love, and staunch friends, and his birds, and the Italian organ-boys, who found in him their friend and teacher.

MEMORIAL NOTICE.

MRS. JAMES RUDDLE.

MARY CATHERINE RUDDLE, of Newport, Isle of Wight, who died December 21, aged 72, was known and respected by a very wide circle of friends. She came of a Birmingham family; her maternal grandfather, James Luckcock, had the credit of founding the Old Meeting Sunday School. She was the third and last surviving child of Henry Whitfield, who died when she was an infant. About six years later her mother married the Rev. Samuel Martin, for more than half a century the beloved pastor of the Congregational Baptist Church at Trowbridge; and it was there, under his wise and kindly care, that the little girl received the impulses which fructified in a long life of genuine piety and abundant usefulness. In 1866 she was married to George Noble Withall, but was left a widow in 1871. Eleven years after she became the wife of the Rev. James Ruddell of Trowbridge, himself a young widower, who had just entered the Unitarian ministry. As a faithful, tactful, and sympathetic sharer in her husband's pastoral work Mrs. Ruddell won the esteem of many friends in different parts of the country, and touching tributes to her memory testify to the affection and honour in which she was held and the widespread appreciation of her wise, balanced, and truly benevolent mind. She was an admirable woman, meeting all difficulties with quiet, sensible courage and self-possession. Her religion was the inner motive of her life and all her doings. One whose knowledge of her was peculiarly intimate has said: "She always seemed to me the type of whatever is truest and best in the Unitarianism of the older school—of those who are bred in the faith, who draw their spiritual strength from it, who live worthy lives, and have no desire and no need to seek any other religion." Peace be with her, and with the husband, daughter, and stepdaughter who mourn her loss.

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

BEFORE THE WAR—AND AFTER.

LECTURES AT THE HIGH PAVEMENT CHAPEL, NOTTINGHAM.

EARLY in August it was decided by the Council at the High Pavement Chapel to inaugurate a series of lectures on 'Europe as it has been in the past, as it now is, and as it ought to be,' chiefly with the aim of encouraging a right understanding as to the causes of the War, and of quickening public thought and sentiment as to the ideal settlement at its close, and the fundamental principles involved in any attempt to secure a just and lasting peace.

The enterprise was very obviously open to the criticism that the time was not yet ripe for such considerations; that the nation must give its whole mind meanwhile to the conduct of the War, to securing recruits for the new armies, and to supporting the Government in its policy and its stupendous task. But the Council realised that, even in those early days of the War, tendencies of thought were setting in, opinions crystallising, and that just as the corporate mind was quickened and informed, then and thereafter, on the issues involved in the struggle, so would the conduct of our statesmen be influenced and modified in the day of settlement; and they now feel that the results of their action have amply justified them in having arranged the lectures to provide a focus for thought and discussion on those grave matters.

At first the Lecture Committee met with unexpected difficulties in securing a suitable and capable lecturer, but finally, Mr. R. C. F. Dolley, M.A., Professor of History at the University College, Nottingham, consented to give a course of six lectures, and Mr. G. Lowes Dickinson, M.A., of King's College, Cambridge, who was in hearty sympathy with the object in view, responded willingly to the invitation of the Council to give the concluding lecture. Various local gentlemen of leading and influence, including Nottingham's new Mayor, the Principal of the University College, and others, undertook to act as chairmen on the several Thursday evenings, and their support helped largely in securing public interest in the lectures, while the churches and all the educational institutions in the city, such as the Workers' Educational Association, assisted in making the effort widely known.

The audience, week by week, numbered from 150 to 200, and as the treatment of the subject developed, the interest deepened in a very striking way, as evidenced, for example, in the conduct of the Discussion Class (held at the close of each lecture, and attended every week by about two-thirds of the audience), at which questions were asked and points raised for discussion. A considerable number of essays were also submitted for criticism, and Prof. Dolley conducted a very extensive correspondence with other members of his audience. The educative influence of the meetings was further enhanced by the provision of appropriate literature on a bookstall, conducted in turn by various leading booksellers in the town, the course of reading suggested by the lecturer being followed by many members of the audience.

Prof. Dolley at the outset gave a very vivid and impressive review of the rise and decline of the Roman Empire, and of the so-called "Holy Roman Empire," succeeding in a striking way, even in dealing with facts so remote, in keeping before his audience the bearing of these facts upon our present problems. The evolution of the national states in Europe from the conditions obtaining during the Middle Ages, and the roots of the present War in the inter-relationships and past conflicts of those nationalities, was vividly portrayed in the second, third, and fourth lectures, and the fifth and sixth were devoted to a discussion of the principles suggested from various sources as being necessarily involved in European action at the close of the War if a just and lasting peace were to be secured.

Mr. G. Lowes Dickinson in the seventh and concluding lecture traced the causes of the War in instinct and the idealisation of instinct, in ideas, such as false conceptions of the nature of the State, and in various political factors; laid down as necessary conditions of an abiding peace a change of will in the individuals composing each nation, and new organisation in many directions, political and economic; and finally advocated the formation of a "League of Peace" among the nations which would lead ultimately to a firmly established "Federation of Europe," an idea which he has fully worked out in the booklet which he has just issued entitled 'The War and the Way Out.'

The lectures aroused so much interest that it was felt they merited more than brief thanks at their conclusion, and at a Special Meeting, convened for the purpose, the thanks of the Council to Prof. Dolley and Mr. Dickinson, and to the Council on behalf of those who had attended, were suitably expressed, and it was announced that Prof. Dolley had consented to submit his lectures in abbreviated form to the Council for publication. That local interest in the lectures has been deeply stirred is indicated in the fact that in response to a very widespread desire a further meeting is being arranged, at which the members of the lecture audience will again meet with Prof. Dolley to renew the discussion.

The lectures were all very fully reported in the local press.

BRITISH COUNCIL FOR ANGLO-GERMAN FRIENDSHIP.

THE Committee of the British Council of Churches for fostering friendly relations between the United Kingdom and Germany has issued the following statement, signed by its Secretary, the Right Hon. W. H. Dickinson, M.P. :—

Since the outbreak of war the Executive Committee of the British Council have given earnest consideration to the question as to what, if any, action should be taken by the Council. The labours of the Associated Councils in England and Germany seem, for the moment, to have failed in their object. It was hoped that by cultivating friendship amongst those who guided religious life in both countries the influence of Christian men might become sufficiently powerful to overcome certain tendencies which for some years past have poisoned the relationships between two great Saxon races. In this task the Associated Councils were undoubtedly progressing. Thousands of persons on both sides of the Channel had been drawn into sympathy with this work. But time has not allowed of its full fruition. The war-cloud has burst with appalling suddenness, and Europe is overwhelmed by a cataclysm before which we seem to be powerless.

It is not for this Executive to discuss the causes of the War or to say anything which may widen the terrible breach that the War has made between the two countries; but they think it necessary to record it as their opinion that when the facts of the case have been laid bare it will be made clear to the whole world that the responsibility for the outbreak of hostilities did not lie with the British nation. In all the circumstances of this most lamentable occurrence it seems to the Executive Committee that the wisest and the most fruitful policy for the Council to adopt will be to refrain from all corporate action for the present. During the clash of arms the voice of friendship can hardly be heard; but when the struggle is over the occasion may arise when it will be possible to repair the friendship which has been so grievously shattered, and, perhaps, to base it on more secure foundation. The Council's organization may then prove to be of great value, and with this view the Committee consider that every effort should be made to keep it in being.

In pursuance of this policy the Committee have thought it wise to hold over the issue of The Peacemaker, which has been the official organ of the British Council.

The Committee feel sure that every member of the British Council has witnessed with the most sincere grief the rupture between England and Germany. But the hope of better things must not be abandoned, and though the Associated Councils will have to wait, they may still look to a time when their peoples shall be reconciled, and the true brotherhood of nations universally accepted.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

The President of the Sunday School Association has issued the following New Year's Letter to Senior Scholars :—

DEAR COMRADE,—As a senior scholar myself, at least I hope so, I am writing to you and my 10,000 comrades, and am sending the Happy New Year wish with the hope that when the President writes twelve months hence happier circumstances may prevail and the war cloud may have passed.

My message to-day shall take as its burden "Happiness," for which all of us seek after, although we may each define it differently and strive for it along different paths. So far as memory helps me, I will put down the thoughts expressed in an address on the subject heard some time ago.

First, then, to be content with what you possess; meaning our opportunities, powers, and talents. Realize these in your mind, and let them be the foundation on which you are to build. How may they benefit you personally, and how may they benefit your neighbours.

All of us have to face at times difficulties, illness, and hardships, and when the trouble comes we feel overwhelmed, and have a way of thinking and acting as if everything were well-nigh hopeless. We want an idea of proportion. Supposing you were in a railway carriage speeding through the country. Look out of the window; the near objects you are passing confuse and, indeed, pain the eyesight. What a difference the same objects viewed at a little distance and in the midst of their surroundings will present! Try and think out this illustration and it may help you to face your own trouble more bravely.

We all know how helpful a cheerful companion is when troubles come. Will you do your part to cheer some one in need, and you will find that the efforts you make will react upon yourself. The task is not an easy one, for you may not feel cheerful yourself. We can then follow the child's example and "Let's pretend." It is a good first step, and the further step towards accomplishing the real object will be easily followed.

Changes are continually taking place: new discoveries, new thoughts, new methods, new opportunities. Let us keep an open mind and endeavour to keep up with the new movements so far as we can. It will save us from disillusionment and disappointment. Don't be like a clerical gentleman whom I heard say in a railway carriage—when his companion suggested that he should read some interesting magazine articles describing discoveries adding more light on Biblical writings—"No, thank you, I shall be better without that."

Life is full of mystery, and it is easy to go astray. When we think seriously how little we really do understand, we feel that guidance in which we can put our trust is absolutely needed. We are given varied powers to lead and guide us, also the experiences of others and our own, all of which help to mould our actions and to create ideals of conduct. We want a firm trust that in so far as we follow out our highest ideals we shall be doing our part, and that in God's providence good will prevail over evil.

Perhaps you will think out these thoughts for yourself on Contentment, Proportion, Cheerfulness, the Open-mind, and Trust; and in endeavouring to realize them help in the accomplishment of my wish to you of a Happy New Year.

Yours sincerely,

ION PRITCHARD,
President.

THE FAITH OF A LIBERAL CHRISTIAN.

In closing his long ministry at Essex Church, Kensington, the Rev. F. K. Freeston made the following profession of the personal faith, which has been the light and inspiration of all his work in the pulpit :—

If I have had to criticize Collective Creeds which bind chains on the mind, I have pleaded for the personal creed which must be the thought out result of one's own faith and life.

Behind all I have said there has been in my mind the Christ Gospel of the coming of God's Kingdom to men; with the Church as its realization and pioneer, its longing the Lord's Prayer, its watchwords the Beatitudes, its laws the two Great Commandments, its duty the Golden Rule, its morality the Good Samaritan, its theology the parable of the Prodigal Son. Only thus will the kingdoms of the world become the kingdoms of our God and of his Christ.

I believe in one God, the Father Almighty, Maker of Heaven and earth; and in Jesus Christ our Leader and Master in Faith, the Light, the Truth, and the Way of Life.

I believe in the Holy Spirit which beareth witness with our Spirit; in the Catholic Church, the Bond of Peace, the Communion of Saints, the Forgiveness of Sins, and the Life Everlasting.

I believe in private prayer and public worship; in the duty of sacrifice and the discipline of the Cross; in the faith that removes mountains, the hope that always saves, and the love that never fails.

I believe in the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man; in the service of those who love for the sake of those who need; in the coming of the Kingdom to the world.

I believe in the Liberty of Thought, the Duty of Private Judgment, the Progress of Revelation, and the Spirituality of Religion.

I believe that all things should be done in this world to the praise and glory of God, for the triumph of Righteousness, and the Victory of the Good.

It is a privilege to be the minister of such a Church, to speak what you wish, to teach what you reverence, to come into personal touch with so many different lives, and to proclaim the Gospel of the Kingdom to all those who will hearken.

THE SUSTENTATION FUND.

A SPECIAL MEETING of the Managers of the Sustentation Fund was held at Essex Hall on Thursday, December 31. The following managers were present: the Rev. J. Harwood (in the chair), the Revs. W. G. Tarrant, F. K. Freeston, W. Copeland Bowie, and Messrs. P. Preston and Ronald P. Jones. The meeting had been called to make arrangements for the secretarial duties during the absence of the Hon. Secretary, Mr. H. F. Pearson, on military duties. A resolution was passed congratulating Mr. Pearson on the action he had taken, and expressing the pleasure of the Managers that he would still continue to hold the secretaryship. The Rev. W. H. Drummond was invited to undertake the duty of acting secretary during Mr. Pearson's absence. Until further notice all correspondence relating to the Fund should be sent to Mr. Drummond, at 23, Cannon Place, Hampstead, N.W.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Birmingham.—In spite of very inclement weather a large congregation assembled last Sunday evening at Waverley Road Church, Small Heath, when the Rev. Dr. James Drummond, of Oxford, was the preacher. The Rev. Gertrude von Petzold conducted the devotional part of the service.

Bolton.—The Rev. J. Cyril Flower, M.A., Minister at Sale Unitarian Chapel, has accepted an invitation to the pulpit at Bank Street Chapel, Bolton, and will take up his duties about the middle of April.

Chowbent.—On the afternoon and evening of Christmas Day the annual party was held at the schools attached to Chowbent Chapel, and the Rev. J. J. Wright took the chair for the twenty-fourth year in succession. In his speech of welcome he mentioned that forty-two young men in connection with the congregation and Sunday School were engaged in military duty. Last Sunday there were special services of Intercession in the chapel, the offertories being given to the Red Cross Fund.

London: Hackney.—Miss Green, Secretary and Superintendent of the New Gravel Pit Unitarian Sunday School, had the pleasure of distributing the prizes, and the Rev. Bertram Lister of presiding at the Pembury Grove (Clapton) Primitive Methodist Sunday School annual distribution on Monday, January 4. The entertainment, which was greatly appreciated, was also contributed by children from the Unitarian Sunday School.

London: Wandsworth.—On Sunday evening the first of a series of monthly "National" Services was held. There was a large attendance, and the hymns (taken from the special collection, 'Hymns in Times of National Crisis,' recently issued at Essex Hall) were sung with much impressiveness. Among them was Ebenezer Elliott's 'God Save the People,' which formed the subject of the address by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant. Both morning and evening selections were read from the Form of Service issued for use on Intercession Sunday, and collections were taken on behalf of the Red Cross and Order of St. John Societies.

Liverpool: Hope Street Church.—At a meeting of the Hope Street Church Committee on December 14 reference was made to the death of Mr. Philip Holt, and it was resolved that the following record of appreciation, which had been drafted by Mr. Armstrong and Dr. Mellor, should be inscribed in the Minutes of the Committee: "The Minister and Committee of Hope Street Church heard with deep regret of the death of Mr. Philip Henry Holt, which occurred on November 27, 1914. They have also heard, what was previously unknown to them, that it is to Mr. Holt that Hope Street Church is, and will ever remain, indebted for the generous gifts which, from time to time during the past ten years, have been received from an 'anonymous donor.' The Minister and Committee desire to place on record, first and foremost, the sense of their great thankfulness for the life of Mr. Holt—a life of incalculable value to the world, inestimably rich in moral and spiritual worth. Mr. Holt's career, in one aspect of it, was crowned with honourable, not to say romantic, success in the commercial life of Liverpool; in another, and ultimately a more valuable aspect, it was a career which apparently achieved a complete triumph over selfishness, mastered the inner secret of all true happiness, and found its highest joy in continually fostering, largely in secret and without thought of publicity, a wide range of beneficent human activities, not least among which was reckoned the cause of liberal religion. The finest fragrance and the brightest radiance of Mr. Holt's life were of the deeply spiritual order, and can only be rightly valued through earnest endeavour to cultivate the same spiritual gifts. That so fine a life was given to the world must ever be a cause of joy to all who value the nobler things of the spirit and the highest welfare of mankind. In the second place, the Committee would record their gratitude for Mr. Holt's munificence towards Hope Street Church, and the humble pride of themselves and their successive ministers that they should have been deemed worthy of such gifts by such a man. They are deeply sensible of the responsibilities implied by such generosity, and they desire earnestly so to deal with the Church, so to carry on and to enhance its gracious traditions of religion and of service, that the gifts made by Mr. Holt may become a perpetual source of blessing to many, both now and in the future."

Liverpool: Ullet Road Church.—Reference is made in the Ullet Road Church Calendar to the excellent work done by the Liverpool Battalion of the Boys' Own Brigade. The Fourth Annual Report of the Executive Committee has just been published, and is a most interesting document. It affords abundant proof of the value of such an institution in advancing the moral education of our boys. In no better way could they acquire habits of obedience, discipline, orderliness, neatness, helpfulness, self-respect, and self-control. The Liverpool Battalion comprises four companies: Mill Street, Hamilton Road, Bootle, and Birkenhead, officers and privates totalling 156. Mr. Haigh's account of the Summer Camp at Kirkmichael, I.O.M., presents a fascinating picture of open-air occupations and pastimes. The major and sixteen other officers are at present with His Majesty's Forces. The accounts for the last twelve months show a rather serious deficit, proving the need of a larger number of regular subscribers.

Middlesbrough.—The Rev. J. H. Smith, late of Cheltenham, commenced a six months' pastorate at Christchurch, Middlesbrough, with the New Year, preaching on Sunday, the 3rd inst., to good congregations at both services. On Monday evening a Welcome Meeting was held, presided over by Mr. T. Y. Howcroft. Mr. Thos. F. Ward, J.P., Councillor T. B. Davies, J.P., and the Rev. Arthur Scruton (of Stockton), were among the speakers.

Moseley.—Mr. Stanley R. Gibbon, recently in charge of the congregation at Tamworth, has now commenced his ministry at the Moseley Unitarian Church. On January 4 a meeting to welcome him and Mrs. Gibbon was held in the Dennis Road Council School. The chair was taken by Mr. Alfred Shakespeare, who welcomed Mr. Gibbon in the name of the congregation. On behalf of the ministers in the district speeches were made by the Rev. G. Glyn Evans and the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas. Mr. Ellis Townley, Secretary of the Midland Christian Union, also spoke. Mr. Gibbon, in reply, said that he only claimed on the part of the congregation that they should follow his leadership so long as he gave the inspiration they desired.

Nantwich.—Last Sunday evening a Special Service of Prayer was conducted at the Unitarian Church by the Minister (the Rev. J. Park Davies). Appropriate music was contributed by the choir, including 'In the Time of War and Tumults' (music by Mr. H. Lang Jones) and 'Lest We Forget.' Valuable assistance was given the choir on this occasion by Mr. and Mrs. Lang Jones of Willaston School, the former also rendering very effectively the solo 'God, have Mercy,' from 'St. Paul.' There was a good congregation, and a substantial collection was taken in aid of the Red Cross Society.

Rochdale.—The Monthly Messenger of the Unitarian Church for January reports a very successful Sale of Work which has just been held, by which a sum of £200 was realised. This is the third time in succession that such an amount has been raised by a Sale of Work. The opening ceremony on the first day was performed by the Mayor of Rochdale, Councillor Redfern, J.P., Mr. J. Standing presiding, and on the second day by a group of the Sunday School children trained by Mrs. H. A. Mince. The Messenger also gives a list of thirteen members connected with the Church or School who have joined the forces since the outbreak of War.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

A NEW YEAR'S WISH.

Dr. Charles Wendte, of Boston, U.S.A., sends us the following beautiful and appropriate New Year's wish: "For a world rebuilt; that thought replace unreason, love take the place of hate; that the laughter of little children no more be stilled, the beauty and the strength of women no more be turned to ashes, the vigour of men no more be given to desolate the earth; that for us all the silence of the sunrise bring again the day of service, the quiet of the sunset yield us to the night of rest; that wisdom, faith, and patience fail us not, facing the eternal task of peace through brotherhood."

A MESSAGE FROM QUEEN ALEXANDRA.

Queen Alexandra has sent the following New Year's Message—which is published by The Gentlewoman—to the women of the Empire, especially to those who have suffered bereavement through the War: "I wish to send to the Women of the Empire at this great crisis in our history a message of hope and consolation for the New Year. You have been through a period of great suffering by the loss of dear ones, and many more sacrifices will yet be demanded of you, but I feel that they will be borne with that patience and fortitude which have supported and sustained you throughout the last five terrible months. You have suffered in a great and just cause, and my earnest prayer is that in your sorrow you may be consoled by the thought that those who are near and dear to you have died like heroes for their King and Country. May God pour His infinite blessings upon you in whatever calamities you are called upon to bear until the Blessings of Peace once more dawn upon us.—ALEXANDRA."

ALCOHOL AND THE INDIAN TROOPS.

The Anglo-Indian Temperance Association is taking action in regard to the distribution of intoxicating liquor among the Indian troops, which renders numbers of men—a large proportion of whom are under religious injunction to abstain from alcohol—liable to a grave temptation which many of them may not be able to withstand. The present arrangement is that the rum ration is not issued to Mahommedan troops, but it is given to Hindus or Sikhs, although objectors may have an extra ration of tea instead. The matter was brought to the notice of Lord Roberts just before he left for the Continent. He replied to the effect that it was receiving his best attention, and there is no doubt that it was one of the points into which he was inquiring when he was seized by his fatal illness. All the world knows how earnestly Lord Kitchener has begged the British Expeditionary Force to avoid the temptation of strong drink throughout the present War, and it is particularly desirable that the War Office should not itself provide opportunities for drinking, especially among the Indian troops, most of whom belong to abstemious races.

BIRDS IN THE BRENT VALLEY.

The wood, nineteen or twenty acres in extent, in the Brent Valley, which was acquired as a sanctuary for wild birds by the Selborne Society some years ago, is said to be a haunt of nightingales. Rare birds are not to be found there; but protection is given to no fewer than forty-one species of the commoner kinds who nest there undisturbed. They include the lesser whitethroat, chaffinch, willow-warbler, long-tailed tit, marsh-tit, tree-creeper, hawfinch, goldfinch, redpoll, nut-hatch, cuckoo, red-backed shrike, black-cap, turtle-dove, and wild duck. Of these the golden-crested wren, the three British woodpeckers, the nightjar, brown owl, barn owl, snipe, and kingfisher are seen either commonly or from time to time.

THE DISTRESS IN BENGAL.

The boys of Rabindranath Tagore's School at Bolpur have opened a relief fund to assist those who are suffering as a result of the War, which seriously affects trade in India, as elsewhere. In addition to what the lads can personally contribute, they have imposed a self-denying ordinance upon themselves, and have resolved to save some 40 rupees a month by not using sugar. By not consuming ghee (which is, we believe, a clarified butter) for three months they will also be able to contribute 500 rupees to the fund. The distress in Bengal is very serious, according to The Modern Review (Calcutta), and the agricultural districts are especially affected. Some people, it is said, get a meal once in two days, others once in three days, and a few have actually died of starvation. Such facts bring home to us with startling clearness the far-reaching consequences of a European war, affecting, as it does, every country in the world.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

OUR first word this week must be one of cordial thanks to those of our readers who have responded so quickly and so generously to our appeal for the Hospital for Belgian Soldiers. A good supply of necessaries is being sent out promptly as a result. As we pointed out last week, this is a special piece of work which can be undertaken because it is really needed, without interfering with other efforts to bring succour to the wounded. We have made an excellent beginning, but we want more money and more clothes. Every man who leaves the hospital for the fighting line will take away some of the clothing with him, and his place will be filled by some one else whose needs must be supplied. Mrs. Bernard Allen hopes to organize not one generous donation, but a steady stream of gifts. We may add that M. Vandervelde, as representing the Belgian Government, has received particulars of the scheme; and we shall do our best to keep our readers fully informed about the progress of the work.

THE need of help for the sufferers by the war grows continually. The condition of Belgium and Northern France is typical of vast areas to which it is much harder for us to send help. Many districts in Asia Minor which have been traversed by the Turkish soldiery must be in a terrible condition of starvation and panic. As for Poland and Galicia, it is simply the story of Belgium on a larger scale. A letter in The Times of Thursday describes all that Russia is able to do in the way of relief as a drop in the ocean of misery. Paderewski, who is a patriot as well as a great pianist, has sent the following message to the president of the American Polish Relief Fund: "An area three times larger than Belgium is entirely laid waste. Cities and towns have been destroyed, and thousands of villages burnt down. All horses and cattle have been taken. There is no corn, no potatoes left. There are millions of sufferers, mostly homeless, all lacking food." A fund "Britain to Poland and Galicia" has been started. The address is 95, Bedford Court Mansions, W.C.

THE tone of Sir Edward Grey's preliminary answer to the American Note on the rights of neutral shipping is dignified and friendly, and seems to have produced a good impression upon public opinion in the United States. The dissonant cries of the Press need not cause alarm. We cannot even begin to measure their importance until we know the interests which they represent. Good temper and mutual forbearance ought to reduce the controversy to its right proportions. From this point of view nothing could be better than the last paragraph of Sir Edward Grey's reply:—

Pending a more detailed reply [he writes] I would conclude by saying that his Majesty's Government do not desire to contest the general principles of international law on which they understand the Note of the United States to be based, and desire to restrict their action solely to interference with contraband destined for the enemy. His Majesty's Government are prepared, whenever a cargo coming from the United States is detained, to explain the case on which such detention has taken place, and would gladly enter into any arrangement by which mistakes can be avoided and reparation secured promptly when any injury to the neutral owners of a ship or cargo has been improperly caused, for they are most desirous, in the interest both of the United States and of other neutral countries, that British action should not interfere with the normal importation and use by the neutral countries of goods from the United States.

Sensible people in neutral countries will hardly need to be reminded that their trade cannot be normal while the whole machinery of civilization is dislocated by war. The bitter memories of the Lancashire cotton famine during the American Civil War remain with us to emphasize this point, and should not be forgotten at the present moment on the other side of the Atlantic.

THE short session of the House of Lords gave the opportunity for some public announcements and a good deal of oratory. But the country has not been impressed, and we doubt whether the experiment of using the Upper House as a publicity department is worth repeating. It is a forcible illustration of our practical abandonment of the hereditary principle in government. When we want statements of policy or effective criticism we look to our elected representatives and refuse to accept anything else. Even Lord Curzon becomes rather a shadowy figure in the House of Lords, and cannot compete for a moment in influence and public regard with men of smaller ability in the Commons.

THERE was a good deal of talk about the need of compulsory military service in the debates in the House of Lords. Lord Haldane admitted that in time of national necessity nothing could be barred that became necessary, but this is cold comfort for the doctrinaire conscriptionists, especially when it is taken in connection with his emphatic statement that voluntary service has not broken down.

As regarded voluntary service, he said, the experience of the country in that respect had been very remarkable. Since the war broke out there had been no unwillingness on the part of the nation to respond, and so far the Government saw no reason to anticipate the breakdown of the voluntary system. Compulsory service was nothing foreign to the constitution of the country, and given a great national emergency it might have to be resorted to. He did not think it would be a good thing to resort to it at present. He did not desire to see it resorted to unless it became a final necessity, and it had not yet become a final necessity or anything like it. He hoped the problem would be solved by the magnificent response which was being made, which gave them picked men who, because they volunteered, were much better than the dead level of compulsory service men.

WE hope that the Report of the Royal Commission on the Foreign Office and Diplomatic Service will not be pushed out of sight on account of pre-occupation with the war. It goes a long way in the direction of satisfying the demands which men of democratic sympathies have been making for a long time. There is a growing feeling of dissatisfaction with the traditional secrecy of foreign policy, and a determination in many quarters that the great issues of peace and war must not be entrusted to a small official class into which no man can enter without hereditary wealth. The first step in practical reform is to abolish the prohibitory conditions which deprive the country of the services of some of its ablest men in the sphere of foreign relations. A system which excludes many of the greatest names in modern English politics, and admits men for other reasons than first-rate ability for their work, can have few convinced apologists.

IN his presidential address at the Annual Meeting of the Classical Association last week, Prof. Ridgway said some very sensible things about the immoderate reaction against German scholarship, even when it is good, which has broken out among us. After some pungent words about the foolish worship of the latest thing from Germany, "even though it might be the worthless thesis of some young candidate for his doctorate," which has prevailed in scholastic circles, he continued:—

Now, what a change! Some of those very men who were always lauding everything German, and who did all in their power to stifle free discussion in this country, and some of whom lived by preaching German ideas, were now hurling denunciations on German science, German scholarship, and everything else German in the columns of The Times. The Greeks had a great doctrine, the most vital element in their thought and art—μηδὲν ἄγαν. Let British scholars, theologians, and scientists in the future write it upon the recording tablets of their minds. Let them take whatever, when thoroughly tested, seemed the truth from Germany and everywhere else, and that, too, with full acknowledgment. But let them submit every new idea, whether the product of the greatest German or the humblest British subject, to the same rigid test of criticism, and let them keep clear of those who were so over-violent or so over-civil that every German with them was either god or devil.

THERE is the same strain of saving common sense and just appreciation in the advice given to the Modern Language Association by Mr. W. W. Vaughan of Wellington College. He pleaded that we ought to pay more attention, for our own good, to what was best in the literature of France and Germany. There were other German historians besides Treitschke, and Nietzsche was not the only German philosopher.

We must remember, he said, that it was Lessing that opened our eyes to art; that Wagner opened our ears to music; and that into our hearts we had taken the plays of Goethe and the prose of Heine. And if this witness was needed on behalf of our foes, was it not needed, too, on behalf of our friends? It would, indeed, be sad if the fortitude of France did not make us dissatisfied with what we knew and what we taught of French literature. Such spirit and such patriotism had its rise in a deeper soil than that suggested by the French novel, even by those we had seized for the schoolroom. To understand and make others understand it we must penetrate to the tenderness of the old French poets, the patriotic rhetoric of Racine and Corneille, the humour of Molière, even the overstrained pathos of Victor Hugo. The more convinced we were of the righteousness of our cause, the more resolute we were to carry on this hateful contest until we had saved the German people from the German rulers, the more should we who must stay at home fit ourselves to interpret the richness of the spiritual and intellectual inheritance which fell to us from friend and foe alike.

AT an educational conference held in London last week—it has the rather formidable title of "Provisional Committee for the Development of Regional Survey"—Mr. Valentine Bell gave a delightful account of the way in which he has used local history and topography in teaching a class of over fifty boys in an elementary school in Lambeth. He taught practical arithmetic with the aid of the figures in the report of the Medical Officer of Health, and for writing lessons instead of abstract sentiments he gave them extracts from Domesday Book on Lambeth. In addition, the boys were encouraged to make investigations of their own. They compiled lists of the good and bad influence in the neighbourhood; they explored neighbouring boroughs, and noted any differences from Lambeth—more trees in the streets, different coloured water-carts or different uniforms for officials. They grew curious as to "why the Archbishop of Canterbury had so much land," and proceeded to the grave discovery that his Grace pays no rates. They built up all kinds of local history from the public-house signs; they compared ancient amusements and modern; they collected prints and cuttings and maps of old Lambeth, and found out what Coldharbour Lane looked like when it really was a lane; and they made a list of no fewer than thirteen governing bodies who held sway over Lambeth's destinies. And the result was that they learnt to think, to keep their eyes open, to be interested in life, and to develop some conception of the meaning and responsibilities of citizenship.

WE are afraid that we find it difficult to take the suggestion of the Rev. R. J. Campbell at all seriously, that a general council of the Christian churches should be held under the presidency of the Pope to discuss and determine the issues of the great war. Such a proposal, to be useful, must commend itself not merely as a beautiful abstract ideal, but also reveal some point of close contact with the realities of the situation. Otherwise, it simply provides a new theme for pulpit oratory and letters to the Press. But simply as an ideal it will hardly bear examination. In the first place, such a council would have to be exclusively clerical in its constitution, and would therefore not be representative of much of the deepest Christian experience and the finest Christian judgment in the world. And secondly, it would almost inevitably degenerate into another sinister attempt to endow the Christian church with political functions. There is a suspicion in many minds—it has found frequent expression lately—that the Church has failed, if it does not intervene as arbiter in social and national disputes and lay down its own terms of settlement. Its influence must always be deeper and less visible. It sends its members, men and women of noble character and lofty ideals, to work in the world and gradually to leaven it with their own life, and politics and every department of social activity are purified and uplifted by their goodness; but it does not itself assume a position of dictatorship and control. A Hague Conference, called into existence by the Christian spirit, but free from direct ecclesiastical guidance, is richer in promise for international peace than any conclave of the churches can ever be. Let the churches confess their own failure to make the world a better place than it is, but let them acknowledge that it is due to the poverty of their inspiration, and not to any lack of organized control.

A REVIVAL OF RELIGION.

MANY people are hoping and praying for a revival of religion in our midst. The strain of a terrible anxiety, the feeling of insecurity about everything seen and temporal, the sudden collapse in the face of danger of the luxurious habits and freakish frivolities of our civilization, all this has made life simpler and sterner. It has thrown us back upon the more primitive emotions; by its unwelcome discipline it seems to be preparing us for a new vision of God. If weariness, as George Herbert says, may toss us to God's breast, peril and disenchantment, we imagine, can do no less. In all this there is an element of spiritual wisdom. Nothing is easier in days of prosperity than to mistake refined æstheticism for spirituality, or the cunning words of human wisdom, which trip lightly off the tongue, for the knowledge of God. It is hardship and anxiety which test the substance of our faith. Many of us must bear the yoke before we discover that our supreme need is not God, whom we can discuss as a problem or enjoy as an emotion, but the living Father of our spirits, in whom we can trust, though all the waves of trouble go over our heads.

When we speak in this way, or venture to predict a quickening of spiritual power in many hearts that have been cold and dead, we are met by a voice of sad and sceptical warning. Remember, we are told, that while you are looking for a revival of religion evil passions may be preying upon the hearts of men, and the searching experience, which you are disposed to welcome as a baptism of the Spirit unto life, may in the end sink many souls in perdition. Doubtless some hearts are cleansed and uplifted by emotional pressure, but for others it means little more than intellectual bewilderment and moral confusion, and the easy tolerance of crude forms of superstition from which all rational standards of judgment are withdrawn. This point of view has been expressed with his customary force by the Dean of Durham in a recent sermon.

War [he said] was by no means wholly favourable to religion, although it could not be doubted that it brought home to many individual consciences the central issue with which religion was concerned. For, indeed, war withdrew from normal life its steadying factors and immersed society in a bewildering and terrible uncertainty. Religion seemed to lose hold of morality. The churches were filled with worshippers from whose hearts justice and charity had fled, and Christians fell back with disconcerting promptitude to the ethical plane of the Imprecatory Psalms. All the interests which rested on superstition stood to gain by war, but not religion. War commonly coincided with intellectual sterility and galvanized moribund beliefs and practices into new life. It was certain that the Church of England during the long conflict with France a century ago grew rigid and narrow, and there were reasons for thinking that the tremendous conflict with Germany in which they were now engaged would strengthen every retrograde and sterilizing influence within the Churches.

These are strong words, and they are hard to reconcile with the tone of hopefulness—it is almost spiritual optimism—which comes to us from other quarters. Perhaps we must recognize a fundamental difference of temperament. Some men turn instinctively to every gleam of reviving hope, and welcome it with extravagant joy. Others are full of grave foreboding in face of any passionate movement of the human spirit which seems to them to be lacking in rational control. But standing for a moment midway between these two extremes, and less fearful than Dean Henson of the shallows and miseries of reaction, we are quite ready to give heed to his warning, and to be grateful to him for it. For nothing could be more fatal to the influence of religion than a policy of easy acquiescence in emotional experience, as though it alone, apart from any spiritual effort or judgment of conscience, would cleanse our hearts and set our feet moving in the ways of nobler living. We may be melted into moods of momentary pity, or stirred by splendid appeals to our patriotism, or overwhelmed by the spectacle of suffering and wrong, and come out of it all with wrecked nerves and exhausted emotions. These days of peril and suffering are indeed God's opportunity with us; but it depends upon the way in which we use the opportunity, the calmness of judgment, the quickness of conscience, the trained sense for the real values of life with which we try to meet this astounding experience, whether it passes swift judgment upon us as the victims of reaction, or saves us, yet so as by fire. Of one thing we may be quite sure, there will be no renewal of real religion in our hearts while reason is in abeyance and conscience is fast asleep.

We want, then, to urge our plea against the snare of taking things for granted in this matter of a revival of religion. We must not cease to be reasonable because the air is thick with clamour and excitement, or mistake mere sensation for the action of the Holy Spirit. We are quite right to be impatient of the shallow intellectualism which has usurped too much of our attention and to dismiss the mere critic to a back seat. But this only means that the way will be open for deeper and better thought. The mind, instead of squandering itself in many profitless inquiries, will be recalled to the central problems of faith and action. It is no part of our business as humble Christians to sacrifice our intellectual life, but only its preoccupation with things of minor importance. "If you meddle with religion," said Benjamin Whichcote, "be intelligent and rational in your religion; study religion till the reason of your minds receive satisfaction, for till then you cannot account it your own, neither call it your own; neither hath it security and settlement in its subject." We do well to remember these words, with their calm and penetrating wisdom and their undertone of warning, at a time when too many people are inclined to believe that they can recover religion simply by indulging their emotions. They may drift into superstition in that way; but Christian faith is cast in a more virile mould.

Moreover, emotion itself must submit to the control of conscience. The feelings which invade our hearts at this time are not all good, though through close association with others of a nobler breed we often mistake their true quality. Without ceaseless watchfulness the generous heart becomes the prey of unworthy suspicion, and lovingkindness for our friends has for its counterpart hatred of our foes. When we take knowledge of ourselves we have to confess that from the point of view of feeling alone our lives are no fit mirror of the love of God. Along certain lines of influence we have been touched and helped in unexpected ways, and life has become more sacred to us than it ever was before. But other things have entered in as well, and we are startled to find how feeble we are in self-control, how easily we get angry, or how fiercely we can hate. Clearly it is only the good emotions which can contribute to a revival of religion by uniting us more closely with God, and they can only do this when they are strong enough to quell the turbulence of evil passion, and to make peace in the midst of strife. Upon us, then, is laid the hard task of cleansing our hearts of much perilous stuff, and setting a watch against our ignoble moods of suspicion or ill-will. We must keep steadily before our eyes the exacting standard of Christian love, for is it not written "He that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?" The test is, we know, a very severe one at the present time; but on no other terms have we a right to expect a revival of religion out of the calamities of war.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

DIVINE PERFECTION.

It is little we know of the divine perfections, and yet that little may suffice to fill our souls with admiration and love, to ravish our affections as well as to raise our wonder; for we are not merely creatures of sense that we should be incapable of any other affection but that which entreats by the eyes: The character of any excellent person whom we have never seen will many times engage our hearts, and make us hugely concerned in all his interests: and what is it I pray you that engages us so much to those with whom we converse? I cannot think that it is merely the colour of their face, or their comely proportions, for then we should fall in love with statues, and pictures, and flowers. These outward accomplishments may a little delight the eye, but would never be able to prevail so much on the heart if they did not represent some vital perfection. We either see or apprehend some greatness of mind, or vigour of spirit, or sweetness of disposition, some sprightliness, or wisdom, or goodness, which charm our spirit and command our love: Now these perfections are not obvious to the sight, the eyes can only discern the signs and effects of them; and if it be the understanding that directs the affection, and vital perfections prevail with it, certainly the excellencies of the divine nature (the traces whereof we cannot but discover in everything we behold) would not fail to engage our hearts if we did seriously view and regard them. Shall we not be infinitely more transported with that almighty wisdom and goodness which fills the universe, and displays itself in all the parts of the creation, which establisheth the frame of nature, and turneth the mighty wheels of providence, and keepeth the world from disorder and ruin; than with the faint rays of the same perfections which we meet with in our fellow-creatures? Shall we doat on the scattered pieces of a rude and imperfect picture, and never be affected with the original beauty? This were an unaccountable stupidity and blindness: whatever we find lovely in a friend or in a saint ought not to engross but to elevate our affection: we should conclude with ourselves that if there be so much sweetness in a drop, there must be infinitely more in the fountain; if there be so much splendour in a ray, what must the sun be in its glory? Nor can we pretend the remoteness of the object, as if God were at too great a distance for our converse or our love: he is not far from every one of us, for in him we live and move and have our being. We cannot open our eyes, but we must behold some footsteps of his glory, and we cannot turn them toward him, but we shall be sure to find his intent upon us, waiting as it were to catch a look, ready to entertain the most intimate fellowship and communion with us. Let us therefore endeavour to raise our minds to the clearest conceptions of the divine nature. Let us consider all that his works do declare or his word doth discover of him unto us, and let us especially contemplate that visible representation of him which was made in our own nature by his Son; who was the brightness of his glory, and the express image of his person, and who appeared in the world to discover at once what God is, and what we ought to be: Let us represent him unto our minds as we find him described in the Gospel; and there we shall behold the perfections of the divine nature, though covered with the vail of humane infirmities: and when we have fram'd unto ourselves the clearest notion that we can of a being, infinite in power, in wisdom, and goodness, the Author and Fountain of all Perfections, let us fix the eyes of the soul upon it, that our eyes may affect our heart, and while we are musing the fire will burn.

From The Life of God in the Soul of Man. By Henry Scougal.

The power of Armies is a visible thing,
Formal, and circumscribed in time and space;
But who the limits of that power shall trace Which a brave People into light can bring Or hide, at will, for freedom combating
By just revenge inflamed? No foot may chase,
No eye can follow, to a fatal place
That power, that spirit, whether on the wing
Like the strong wind, or sleeping like the wind Within its awful caves. From year to year Springs this indigenous produce far and near;
No craft this subtle element can bind,
Rising like water from the soil, to find
In every nook a lip that it may cheer.

WORDSWORTH.

[ORD GOD, Who art the Father of all our human race, teach us to love Thee with heart and mind and soul and strength, and our neighbour as ourselves: and show us how so to love and serve our country that everything base and selfish in our patriotism may perish, and only what is noble, free, and sacred may live and grow.

Thou hast, at this time, placed upon us a solemn and terrible commission; to defend the sanctity of public law, and to protect a weak and inoffensive nation in its need. O make us worthy of the task that Thou hast given us. Show us how to perform it with pitying hearts, free from hatred and from malice; and, in our dreadful duty, may nothing but the impersonal and passionless power of justice direct our arms, that we may deserve to pray for victory.

So we entreat Thee for our soldiers and our sailors, on land and sea, in the air above and in the seas below. May the purity of our purpose, and the righteousness of our cause, be their confidence and their shield. Console the mothers bereft and the wives forsaken; be with the widow and the orphan; send us to feed the hungry, to care for the wounded, to honour the dead.

But soon! O God of Mercy, soon! let Thy justice be vindicated, and all these sorrows cease; make wickedness to die out from the hearts of all wrongdoers, that we may take up again the interrupted duties of the common life, with the old suspicions dead, and all new offences forgotten in the mourning and repentance of the world. So may all enmities cease, and the heart of fellowship be reborn; and all Thy children in every nation begin again, and better, to work for Thy kingdom, in which Thy will shall be purely done on earth, as it is in heaven. Amen.

HOSPITALS FOR THE WOUNDED ACROSS THE WATER.

WHEN we crossed the Channel on Christmas Eve we found ourselves in a mental atmosphere entirely different from anything with which we are familiar at home. On this side we know we are at war, but we do not feel it as a real thing. On that side, as we step on to the quay from the steamer, the universal khaki makes us realise that war is close to us, and it is the sad side of war that is most prominent at the moment. Everywhere is the Red Cross, for this is a hospital town. Everything that can be turned into a hospital has been so converted—including the sheds for goods on the quay!—and the streets are full of motor ambulances, and the hospital trains come in daily from the front.

Our first visit on Christmas morning was paid to the Convalescent Camp. Here, on a windy hill-side, is a town of tents. It was a frosty morning, so it was possible to walk about between the tents without being positively stuck in the mud! And the convalescents seemed pleased to exchange Christmas greetings with English visitors. One great Highland giant, with the red hair and blue eyes of his race, told us of his four months' fighting before he was wounded. It turned out that he had served under a nephew of our own, and was beside him when he was killed—a strange coincidence. "Give us a good officer," said he (only he said it in broad Scotch!),

"and we will follow him anywhere!" And he told us the story of that last charge up a hill near the Aisne. Another man said: "The trouble is that you can't sleep after the trenches and the noise of the firing day and night. I have a good bed here, but I have to get out of it and walk about most of the night, because in bed I keep hearing the guns again." He had been a cook, but a German gun found the range of his soup pot, and since then he has been in hospital.

One afternoon we went on board an Indian hospital ship. Here the men had only arrived from the front a few hours earlier, and operations and dressings were still going on very busily. The rows of silent little figures in their white swing coats, and the great black eyes following us round, were most affecting, especially as we could not speak to them in their own language. "I have spent thirty-five years in the Indian Medical Service—we are all old Indians here—," said the commandant, "and there is nothing we don't know about the customs of these fellows, and I see they are all strictly adhered to." And indeed, after seeing the equipment and stores, nothing seems to have been forgotten to make these brave little men feel at home in a strange land.

A most wonderful hospital had been improvised out of a row of most unpromising sheds on the wharf: floors were cemented, windows and ventilators put in, walls whitewashed, heating and lighting apparatus installed, and behold, a modern hospital ward with every possible scientific appliance for helping the patients, including an X-ray apparatus that almost walks round to the beds by itself! There is a cheery air about this place, and the men are getting well fast, and looking forward most of all to a few days across the water before returning to the trenches.

Another hospital is housed in a casino, where the men may lie and gaze on painted ceilings and decorated walls, and see through wide windows the boats going to and fro across the Channel. Here were some men able to be out of bed and finding time very heavy on their hands. A few jig-saw puzzles were almost snatched from the giver's hands: many of the men are so young, and with returning strength they want so much to be amused. I saw a row of penny toys and Teddy bears on a shelf in a small ward of a hospital where a good many officers were. "They are such children, some of them, when they are ill," said the matron. "I had a boy of only 18 here last week: he loved having a toy to play with in bed, and he had done a man's work before coming here." It is one of the saddest sights in the world to see all these fine young bodies wantonly broken in this horrible game of war, and it is one of the most inspiring to see the bravery and gaiety of the patients, and the splendid skill and success of the doctors and nurses in their task, aided as they are by every appliance that knowledge can suggest and generosity supply.

So much for our own men; but what about our gallant Allies, the Belgians, who have no rich friends to shower gifts on them? Many of them are nursed with the greatest care in English and French hospitals. But they are also tended in hospitals of their own, often in circumstances of severe hardship and difficulty. In a side street of another town nearer the front, just within sound of the cannons, is a little English chapel, with rows of beds in the place of pews. Most of the public buildings here, too, are turned into hospitals, some magnificent enough, quite luxurious, and well equipped by generous friends; but this little hospital has no luxuries and no wealthy friends. The great tide of Christmas generosity swept through the hospitals of Northern France, but this little hospital was in a backwater, and none of the gifts reached it. It is for Belgian soldiers, and there are fifty beds for wounded and sick, and all are always full. We asked the nurse in charge if they were short of anything. "We are short of everything," she replied; "short of bedclothes, short of warm clothes for the patients, short of clothes for the men who are cured, and who have to return to the front without proper clothing." It was scarcely necessary to ask the question; one could see how the men had improvised original bed jackets. Their odd costumes would have been funny if they had not been so pathetic. "You see," added nurse, "the men who are well enough to get up have to put on their heavy boots. It is inconvenient, but we have no slippers for them. We should indeed be thankful for warm slippers—nice big ones. But if really you can send us anything, it is warm vests we need most of all."

We went round the hall, talking to the men. Most had only come from the front a few days before. They were not at all inclined to grumble at the shortcomings of the hospital; compared to the trenches it was luxury. Yet all were ready to go back. They were all agreed about two things. First, the Allies were going to win; of course they were, no one had the faintest shadow of doubt about it. And second, the British soldier is a very good neighbour to have in a trench. Their unanimous testimony to the qualities of our soldiers was worth going far to hear. "The Germans are afraid of the English," said one man; and added, with a self-satisfied smile, "They are afraid of us too!" One man had been to England for five weeks with a wounded foot. "For five weeks of my life I was a rich man," he said. "I had motor-cars, went to concerts and plays, and had everything I wanted. I shall never forget it all my life." Another man was a motor cyclist, and had thrilling tales to tell of rides through the darkness at midnight over roads which were roads by courtesy only, and often within range of the enemy's fire. The saddest part of all was the fact that many, indeed most, did not know where their relatives were. We asked many, but received the same sad answer, "I do not know; I have heard nothing of them for months." Sometimes their village had been burnt down. In many cases they added that they hoped they were in England. We visited the hospital several times. In many cases we could not find friends we had made on former visits, and were told that the doctor had passed them again for active service, and back they had gone to the firing line, often enough very inadequately equipped. Some of the cases of frost-bite would probably not have been there had their stock of clothes been warmer and better. Still back they go, with a courage and cheerfulness which is beyond all praise. They are fine fellows, these Belgian soldiers.

And this little hospital is not the only one of its kind; there are others equally in need of help. At least three have come within our knowledge. They cannot appeal to their own country. Their own people, refugees and dependent on others, can send them little in the way of comforts and luxuries. England has already helped. The beds for this hospital came from Birmingham. The little English colony give what help they can to ease the work of the Belgian doctor and nurses (all of whom are honorary). They are very grateful to England, but there is more that we can do. What is wanted is a complete outfit for each bed—nightshirts, dressing jackets and gowns, bed socks, slippers; and for the convalescents, shirts, socks, warm under-clothing, and mufflers. The appeal which appeared last week has called forth a generous response, but we hope that further interest will be aroused by this brief account of our recent visit to the hospitals for the wounded.

THE WAR AS AN EXCLUSIVE TOPIC.

SIR,—In your remarks regretting the further cancellation and postponement of conferences and meetings on account of the war I entirely agree. As you truly remark, "The corporate life of the country cannot go on indefinitely in this state of suspended animation." From the beginning of the war I have felt that the feeling so largely entertained, that the war must entirely absorb all our interest, was unhealthy, and ought not to be indulged in without restraint. For, after all, this war and its concerns, vitally important as they are, do not constitute the whole of life; in fact, from a larger and truer outlook, they are only a small part of life. Is it not time that the Press should realize this, and should again open their columns to the large and general affairs of life, and cease to occupy them exclusively with war news?—Yours, &c.

THE VISION OF PEACE.

DEAR SIR,—There is a passage in your article on 'Help for the Belgian Wounded' which I should like to repeat, viz., "It is well to keep our eyes fixed on the vision of peace, and even amid the clash of arms to cultivate the temper and disposition which will enable us to build wisely when the time comes to repair the ravages of war." And may I also add, may we do it not as Pharisees thanking God that we are not as this publican, Germany. It may not be the time to cry, Stop the War! The people are still in that hypnotic state of mind that calls for the utter crushing of our foe. Such a cry would be regarded as treasonable. But is it not the time for the Christian Churches to set about recovering their Christianity, which has been professed but not possessed? To uphold war may be religion of a sort, but not Christ's Christianity as declared in the Sermon on the Mount. The temper and disposition which will enable us to build wisely are those of the Master, whose declared purpose was to reform our world of its evil militarism, and give it the opposite system of love and goodwill.

To begin with, let us admit that we have denied the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, and repent and do the first works, get back to the principles of that manifesto—the Sermon on the Mount. For this we needed a day, or at least an hour, of humiliation for the Christian Church, whatever the non-Christian part of the population needed. And the time for this is now, and then we may preach a gospel of peace and goodwill to men. How can we repeat the Bethlehem story until we ourselves have been brought back to its meaning? And what a shame it will be if it be left to those outside the Churches to insist that Christ's way of peace and goodwill is the only saving faith for the world. Let us get ready for the conferences of the statesmen after the war by preaching inside what we want to insist on outside, then the voice of the reformed Church will speak with power in favour of a reformed State. What can the National Conference discuss better than this? If it does not "keep its eyes fixed on the vision of peace" it had better not assemble.—Yours, &c.,

SIR HENRY LUNN AND WELSH DISENDOWMENT.

SIR,—Sir Henry Lunn is asking the ministers and official laymen of the various Nonconformist Churches in England and Wales to sign a memorial to the Prime Minister in favour of the repeal of all the clauses of the Welsh Church Act "which deprive the Church of any of its temporalities." The ground upon which this appeal is based is "the great economic and financial pressure resulting from the war felt by citizens of all religious communions." But if one may judge from the terms of the letter by which Sir Henry Lunn seeks to justify his proposal, he would fain have the support of all Nonconformists who for any reason whatever are opposed to disendowment. This financial pressure, due to the war, is the one thing specified in the memorial to Mr. Asquith, but in reality it is only part of Sir Henry's bait. This method of attempting to accomplish a policy in the interests of religion requires no comment. It stands self-condemned. As to the policy itself, only two things need be said. (1) It would confer a permanent financial benefit on the Church of England in Wales, on the ground that its present adherents are suffering a temporary financial pressure in common with citizens of all religious communions. And (2) any attempt to carry it into effect would raise a far more bitter controversy than any we have yet had on either disestablishment or disendowment.

If Sir Henry Lunn is intent on the interests of peace, it would be well for him to reflect on the inevitable consequences of this policy to which, for the present, he has committed himself. And surely it is well that the primary facts bearing on disendowment should be frankly faced. What are these facts? To begin with, disendowment is not now in process. No benefice has been deprived of any part of the endowment revenue hitherto appropriated to its support. Nor will there be any modification of the administration or present use of any of the temporalities of the Church until the date of disestablishment, i.e., until September 18 next, or a later date if the war is not then at an end. Even when the provisions for disendowment have been carried into effect, the Church will not be reduced to a condition of poverty.

One of two things will happen. (1) The Church, through Representative Body, may adopt the method for the commutation of the life interests of the clergy provided for by the Act. If it does this there will be paid over to it a sum of at least two millions. Out of this sum it will be able to meet at once and for many years, on the present scale of expenditure, every financial obligation resting upon it. But (2) if the method of commutation is not adopted, every person who, at the date of the passing of the Act (September 18 last), held by freehold tenure an ecclesiastical office affected by the Act, will retain his existing interest in the emoluments of that office so long as he holds it or any other ecclesiastical office in the Church in Wales to which he may be appointed after the passing of the Act.

Neither of these alternatives lays upon the Church the necessity of raising immediately a large sum of money in order to replace what may be taken away. New endowments will be needed only by degrees as the existing incumbencies cease. No doubt if, in the event of commutation, the Church resolves to keep intact as a permanent endowment the money which will be paid over to the Representative Body as the value of the life interests of the clergy large gifts will be required to meet current expenditure, but that is a consideration for Churchmen themselves. It cannot be expected to weigh with those who are concerned to do what is just and equal to the Welsh people as well as to the Anglican Communion.—Yours, &c.

MAZZINI AND THE MAKING OF ITALY.

II.

1848 was an historic year, for all over Europe the people arose as from slumber, and claimed their freedom and the right to govern themselves. 'It seemed for a time as though Emperors and Grand Dukes and the like had served their day, and were wanted no more. As our own working-men's poet sang, the day had come to save—

Not kings and lords, but nations,
Not thrones and crowns, but men.

Amongst others who fled before the threatening revolution was the Pope—Rome was thus left without a head, and the citizens formed themselves into a republic. This was the very thing Mazzini had been urging them to do, so they invited him to come and be their leader. He was made a Triumvir—that is, one of the three Governors; but in reality everybody looked to Mazzini as the father of the State. Now, although the Roman Republic did not last long, it marked a splendid achievement in the story of Italy and in the career of Mazzini. It seemed to be the fulfilment of a glorious dream of his; for he not only held that a republic, in which the people appoint their own government, is the highest form of the state and the best for all the citizens, but he had pointed to Rome as being the most important seat of a republic in the world. Under the ancient Romans the great city had united Europe by force of arms and by the majesty of her laws. Under the Popes she had gathered the nations about her by her spiritual power. Now, said Mazzini, it is time for a new and still greater Rome to arise—"Rome of the People," devoted to the liberty and brotherhood and progress of all mankind. He even appealed to the Pope to become the leader into the new land of promise, and pledged his utmost help; but the wily pontiff made no reply, and was planning at this time another way to recover his own. Some people expected that Mazzini, now that he had the power, would treat the Papists harshly, but that was not his way. He told the people that the priests would do no harm, but were powerful to do good. He set himself to improve the salaries of the poorer clergy, and when an excited crowd dragged some confessional boxes from the churches, he reminded them that from those confessionals words of comfort had been spoken to their mothers, and they were at once taken back. The Triumvir's own life was such a noble example of self-sacrifice and of simplicity that the whole city looked up to him as its father. Exhausting labours wore down his thin form, but his face seemed to shine with the glow of his spirit. When he was conducted to the palace of the Quirinal, which was to be his home, he seemed ill at ease, and hunted for a room "small enough to feel at home in." Though it was feared that his enemies might attempt to assassinate him, he would have no guard, and poor and rich alike met with the same smile and warm handshake.

He lived on the plainest food, dining amongst the people of the streets, and when alone at night he would sing to his guitar.

But this happy state of affairs was doomed to collapse before an unexpected blow. Prince Louis Napoleon, the unscrupulous President of the French Republic, for ends of his own sent troops to lay siege to Rome and restore it to the Pope. The heroic Garibaldi was in command of the Italian volunteers who formed the garrison, and the French attack was routed. The prisoners were, however, treated with great kindness, and released with presents of cigars. Then negotiations took place so as to avoid further fighting, but suddenly the French general returned with a more powerful army. For a month the ill-provided city held out against overwhelming odds. The poor people driven from their homes by the shells of the enemy were lodged in the palaces of the nobles who had fled; but they promised in the name of "God and the People," the legend inscribed on their flag, to steal or injure nothing; and they kept their word.

When the walls could no longer be defended, the French were allowed to enter the city, but Mazzini was not molested, and shortly after made his way to England, his future home. For over twenty years more he laboured for his country, ever "sweet and calm, but full of a fiery purpose." In course of time the unity of the Italian nation was established, not, indeed, as a republic, but under Victor Emmanuel as king. To this end Cavour "the brain," and Garibaldi "the sword," contributed no less than Mazzini "the soul."

MEMORIAL NOTICE.

DR. W. C. COUPLAND.

WE regret to announce the death of Dr. William Chatterton Coupland, who was known to many of our readers as a personal friend or a writer on philosophical subjects. He was the eldest son of Mr. W. N. Coupland, and was born in Fenchurch Street, E.C., on December 2, 1838. He was educated at Denmark Hill Grammar School, where he had for schoolfellows the late Lord Herschell and the late Dr. Pye Smith, F.R.S. His college days were spent at University College and Manchester New College, London. At M.N.C. he was a younger contemporary of Dr. James Drummond and Prof. C. B. Upton. He took the M.A. degree in London University, and subsequently that of D.Sc. in Mental and Moral Science. In 1861 he won a Hibbert scholarship, and proceeded to Germany to study philosophy and theology. Prof. Trendelenberg of Berlin introduced him to Prof. Karl Passow and his family, with the result that he took German lessons from Fräulein Gerfrud Passow, who subsequently became his wife. The marriage took place in 1866. From 1864 to 1868 Dr. Coupland was Unitarian minister at Bridgwater. In 1868 he settled in London, and after a brief ministry at Notting Hill, at the small church which preceded the present Essex Church, he removed to the house in Maitland Park, Haverstock Hill, which was the scene of his own labours and of Mrs. Coupland's stimulating teaching and friendship for thirty years. The rest of his life was devoted entirely to teaching and writing, chiefly in philosophical subjects. In 1884 his translation of 'The Philosophy of the Unconscious,' by E. von Hartmann, was issued, and the next year he published 'The Spirit of Goethe's "Faust." The latter book was a literary study based upon a course of lectures. It contains a careful exposition of the Faust legend and its treatment by Goethe, its discussion of the problems of the Second Part being of especial value. The foundation of the English Goethe Society owed a great deal to the energy and enthusiasm of himself and Mrs. Coupland. In 1886 he was appointed its first secretary, and held the office for five years. In 1890 he published 'The Gain of Life, and other Essays in Philosophical Subjects.' This was followed in 1895 by the most widely known of his works, 'Thoughts and Aspirations of the Ages,' a rich collection of passages from the sacred Scriptures and noble writings of the world which has been found highly suggestive and stimulating by many readers. In 1898 he received at the hand of the Government an honourable recognition of the value of his contributions to philosophy and literature in the form of a Civil List Pension of £50.

Mrs. Coupland died on March 16, 1902, after a short illness. Her death was a severe blow to him, and he spent the next few years in collecting her literary remains and in writing a memoir. These were printed for private circulation in 1908. The slender volume is the most tender and human of all his writings, and contains a portrait of a remarkable personality, which is treasured by many to whom Mrs. Coupland first opened the treasures of German literature. This was his last literary task, and gradually, as the years crept on, he began to lose his hold on the interests which had absorbed his life; but it was noticeable that he seemed as an old man to recover some of the religious sentiments and affections which had been in abeyance during his maturity. In recent years he was a member of the Richmond Free Church, and subsequently, during his residence at Hove, of the Free Christian Church, Brighton. He died on January 6, in the 77th year of his age. On the following Saturday his remains were cremated very quietly at Golder's Green.

MEETINGS AND GENERAL NEWS.

THE PEASANT ARTS FELLOWSHIP.

A SOCIAL GATHERING was held at the Conference Hall of the University of London Club, Gower Street, in connection with the Peasant Arts Fellowship on Wednesday evening, when a short paper on 'Rheims and Gothic Reconstruction' was read by Mrs. Joseph King, editor of The Vineyard. Since the outbreak of the war The Vineyard has been obliged to temporarily suspend publication, but hopes are held out that this interesting and unique little monthly will be able to resume its work before long. In the meantime the Fellowship, of which Dr. Greville Macdonald is chairman, is still continuing its activities on behalf of the restoration of simple country life and crafts, which it believes to be a spiritual and economic necessity.

In her paper on Wednesday night, Mrs. King dealt with her subject along these lines, dismissing the discussion of it from an architectural standpoint altogether. The whole emphasis was laid on the fact that, while as a nation we have made a vigorous protest against the bombardment of the great cathedral of Rheims, as well as other beautiful and historic buildings, during the present war, we have not paid sufficient attention to the far more disastrous destruction of creative imagination and human happiness involved in the industrial system which is at the bottom of all international conflicts. The Krupp guns were the visible expression of soul-degrading aims which not only shattered cathedrals, but whittled away those very qualities which had alone made the building of them possible, and our outcry against the acts of "Huns and barbarians" was not altogether creditable to us while we ourselves, in common with all modern civilized nations, were responsible for the destruction of so much beauty on every side. The industrial system as we knew it, the speaker continued, with its rapid growth of mechanical methods and its suppression of the joy and initiative which characterized the craftsmen of the mediæval guilds, and produced those glorious churches and minsters, with all their store of decorative and sculptured detail, stained glass, metal-work, and other priceless treasures which we now preserve with jealous care—this system had not been accepted without question, and the best minds amongst us were always trying to alter and improve it. But it was essentially wrong, and no amount of patching and ameliorating would do away with that wrongness, involving, as it did, the crippling of the imagination and the will, the deadening of spirit and the cheapening of labour, and destroying more beauty at its source than all the guns of the armies could shatter. At the other end of the modern city in which some glorious cathedral stood, every stone of which we cherished because the vital impulses which had brought it into being no longer moved the workers of our day, were the ugly factories, barrack-like dwellings, and sordid streets which testified to the isolation of all that mummified beauty from the real life of the people. Why were these works of man in the past so precious, and rightly precious, to us? It was because they represented something which had been largely lost, and which our present social conditions and mechanical inventions could never produce. Cathedrals did not come down out of heaven ready made. They were, indeed, the work of God, but the Master-builder used human tools for His purpose; He used the imagination and dexterity of the craftsmen, the passion of the people, gentle and simple, which went to the building and rebuilding of Chartres, for instance; the religious spirit inspiring men would take in hand no building, lay no gift on the altar, until every one had given his brother forgiveness.

Progress, Mrs. King continued, so good a word when it stood for the real needs of the people, meant nothing if it indicated mere material aggrandizement, luxury, and physical power, yet it was that idea of progress which hypnotized our age, and few, indeed, were those, even among the artists, who protested against its influence. Tolstoy and Ruskin brought all their art and spiritual passion to bear upon this fact, telling us that mechanical industrialism under capitalism is essentially wrong in inspiration and motive, and that it must still be wrong in any social order, because it made the craftsman the slave of the machine, and of an un-Christian and unnatural conception of life. The attempt to hide this fact by instruction in hygiene, the erection of model dwellings, and the multiplication of cinemas was foredoomed to failure, and these Sisyphean labours would no more bring back the creative power of the imagination than they would make grass grow on an asphalt pavement.

Mr. Godfrey Blount interested the audience by describing his first attempts at toy-making since the war had stopped the trade in German toys, and several members of the Society afterwards joined in singing folk-songs and sailors' chancies. Some quaint and delightful specimens of Mr. Blount's work were on exhibition in a corner of the room, and we understand that toy-making is now being attempted, under his instructions, at the New Crusade Workroom, 60, Cleveland Square, where numerous activities are at present being carried on under the auspices of the Peasant Arts Fellowship.

THE Cambridge University Press will shortly publish 'Belgium in War,' by Mr. J. H. Whitehouse, M.P., a record of the author's recent experiences during his tour through Belgium. The text will be supplemented by several photographic illustrations, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer will contribute an Introduction.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Bath.—The Social Committee of Trim Street Chapel entertained at Beau Nash House, on Wednesday evening (6th inst.), a party of sixty men of the 4th Somerset Light Infantry, at present quartered at Prior Park. A substantial tea was served at 5 o'clock, and from that time onwards until 9.30 the room presented a scene of great animation, both hosts and guests entering into the proceedings in the heartiest possible manner. The Rev. A. Cunliffe Fox, on behalf of the congregation, offered a warm welcome to the visitors, and expressed the hope that they would carry away with them, wherever they were sent, pleasant memories of their sojourn in Bath, along with the earnest prayers of its people for their safe and happy return. An excellent programme followed, much of it being impromptu and contributed by the men themselves.

Birkenhead.—Many past and present members of the Unitarian Church and Sunday School have joined the forces, their names being given in the 'Calendar for January.' The schoolroom is thrown open every evening, from 5.30 to 9 o'clock, for the convenience of soldiers now undergoing training in the town who care to make use of it. On the first evening, December 15, between 150 and 200 men were entertained.

Crewkerne.—On the 6th inst. the congregation attending the Unitarian Church assembled at the Drill Hall to say farewell to the Rev. A. and Mrs. Sutcliffe, whose departure from the town is so much regretted, and to present them with substantial tokens of the respect in which they are held. The hall had been charmingly decorated, and there was a very large attendance. During an interval Mr. E. J. Blake said that he had been asked by the congregation to represent them in presenting to Mr. and Mrs. Sutcliffe some token expressive of their appreciation of the work they had carried out since their appointment to the pastorate of the church. It was with very great regret the congregation parted from them, and Mr. and Mrs. Sutcliffe would carry away with them the best wishes of all for their future happiness and prosperity. The presentations took the form of a jewelled pendant and a solid silver rose bowl to Mrs. Sutcliffe, and a silver inkstand and pen tray and a purse of gold to Mr. Sutcliffe. This was accompanied by an illuminated address (in which special reference is made to the remarkable growth of the Sunday School and the membership of the congregation during Mr. Sutcliffe's ministry). The Rev. A. Sutcliffe and Mrs. Sutcliffe both returned thanks.

At a meeting of the House Committee of the Hospital, the Vicar (the Rev. H. D. Lewis) referred with regret to the departure of the Rev. A. and Mrs. Sutcliffe. Mr. Sutcliffe had rendered useful service in the Hospital, and they all wished him much happiness in his new home.

Girls' Own Brigade.—Officers of the G.O. Brigades from Brixton, Ilford, and Hackney met at the New Gravel Pit Church, Hackney, on Thursday, January 7, to discuss the formation of a Central Committee for conducting the affairs of the Brigade and matters relating thereto. Officers were elected, rules drawn up, and the general lines of policy to be adopted decided on. The Executive Council will consist of two representatives of each company, with Miss E. H. Green, Tudor House, 12, Darnley Road, Hackney, N.E., as Hon. Secretary. The Brigade, which has been in existence at Hackney for two years, has proved an unqualified success, is intended to supply a long-felt want amongst the girls of our Sunday Schools, and aims at accomplishing its objects by means of classes for drill, singing, home-nursing, needlework, &c. Those interested in work amongst the girls of our schools should obtain further information from the Hon. Secretary. The Companies at present affiliated are Hackney (No. 1 Company), Ilford (No. 2 Company), and Brixton (No. 3 Company).

Heywood.—A Sale of Work was held on New Year's Day at the Unitarian Church which realised 134*l*. At the Annual Meeting of the local Branch of the British Women's League, which was held on January 10, it was decided to send some clothing for the Belgian wounded in France, in response to Mrs. Bernard Allen's appeal in our columns. Various parcels have already been sent to the Belgian refugees in Manchester, to the orphan and lost children in Holland, and to the British troops. Mrs. Worthington was appointed president. The members have decided to join the Manchester and District Branch of the League.

Horsham.—The death has occurred of Mrs. Margaret Price, an old and deeply respected member of the Free Christian Church. She first came to Horsham forty years ago, during the ministry of the Rev. M. G. Dunbar, and successive ministers in the pulpit, together with the Church workers whose activities she shared, owed much to her kindly encouragement and warm hospitality. Mrs. Price was herself an earnest worker in the cause of Temperance, and for many years acted as collector for the Horsham Total Abstinence Society. After her husband's death she resided in London, and joined the Hackney congregation. The funeral took place on Monday, January 11, at Horsham, and was conducted by the Revs. J. J. Marten and V. Moody.

Manchester: Moss Side.—At the New Year's Social Gathering in connection with the Unitarian Church a warm welcome was given to the Rev. F. M. Salmon, who has become the permanent minister of the congregation. There is a most promising revival of interest and activity, both in the institutional and religious work of the church, and, in spite of the weather, the Sunday attendances are increasing. On January 10 Mr. Salmon delivered the first of a series of Sunday evening sermons on 'Social Forces: Destroying and Up-building.'

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

SCHOOL FOR REFUGEE CHILDREN.

Owing to the generosity of M. Emile Mond, member of the Council of the Institut Français du Royaume Uni, a Lycée (secondary school) for boys and one for girls are to be opened on the 18th inst. at 15 and 17, Buckingham Palace Gardens, for the children of French and Belgian refugees who are debarred by the difficulty of the language from attending an English school. The programme followed will be exactly that of a French Lycée, and free tuition will be given to the children of French and Belgian refugees, and to French, Belgian, or English children whose fathers are serving in the Army or Navy. The premises have been lent, and the London County Council has made itself responsible for the necessary furniture, in addition to arranging for the pupils to have games and sports with the children of their schools.

THE INVASION OF FRANCE IN 1814.

We are fond of saying that history repeats itself, but, perhaps, never is the adage so true as when it is applied to the conduct of war and the hardships which are endured by the inhabitants of a country under the heel of the invader. We are reminded of this in reading the entertaining series of letters in The Nineteenth Century, written by Madame de Pougens, the daughter of Mr. Sayer, a personal friend of George III., from Paris and the Valley of the Aisne a hundred years ago. They have been gathered together by Lady Kinloch-Cooke, who gives a sympathetic description of Madame de Pougens as a woman of much kindness and amiability, who was universally endeared to a large circle of friends. Madame de Pougens identified herself fully, it seems, with the interests of her adopted country, though she always remained an Englishwoman at heart, and not even the ravages of the Prussian soldiery and Cosques, which caused her to detest war, could diminish her sense of humour, or abate the zest with which she described the stirring events of her time. Many of the letters were written at Vauxbuins, near Soissons, at a time when the district was practically in a state of siege, and the peasants were suffering sorely from the depredations of the enemy. "The mayor of the village," she explains, "who is as arrant a Vicar of Bray as ever lived in the days of good Queen Anne, resides at Soissons, and leaves us entirely to the care of his deputy the Blacksmith, qui perd la tête à chaque menace."

In a letter written three months before the battle of Waterloo, Madame Pougens refers to the secret name, "Le petit Père la violette," by which Napoleon was known practically throughout the French Army, for it was commonly rumoured that he would appear with the violets in spring on the Seine "to chase from hence the priests and emigrants who have insulted the national flag." "If you knew how I have longed to write to you, dearest friends, during all these wonderful, almost miraculous events," the letter runs, "you would, I am sure, pity me for the restraint laid on my pen, first by fear and prudence, and since by the assurance here that the letters did not pass. But to-day I have received a letter from M. de Pougens, who is at Paris; he tells me the couriers pass as usual, and that several English are arrived in Paris, so I hope the sweet blessing of Peace will be continued to both countries. What a revolution: I call it a révolution à la violette. You know doubtless the soldiers during the last year gave the Emperor the name of le petit Père la violette, and used to say to each other allons, camarade, allons boire à la violette, which continued a profound secret amongst themselves."

UNIVERSITY EXTENSION LECTURES.

The only two courses of University Extension Lectures which will be given this term in the London Museums are both by Mr. Banister Fletcher, F.R.I.B.A. The series which began on January 7 at the British Museum, deals with 'Ancient Roman Architecture,' and the other course of lectures, the first of which was delivered on January 11 at the Victoria and Albert Museum, deals with the subject of English Gothic architecture. There will be special lectures at Westminster Abbey and the Tower of London, also a description of the cathedrals and towns and trade halls of Belgium.

SOCIALIST TEACHING IN GERMANY.

Socialism, in belligerent and neutral countries alike, is beginning to recover from the signal defeat of its most cherished hopes which it sustained at the outbreak of the war, and an earnest attempt is to be made at the forthcoming Socialist Peace Congress at Copenhagen to formulate some practical ideas in regard to the policy to be adopted by all who desire a permanent peace when the present conflict is over. There has been a good deal of plain-speaking in Germany on the part of the Socialist critics of militarism, and the warmest expressions of goodwill have been sent by Socialist women to their comrades in Great Britain, who have responded in the same cordial manner. That hatred of the enemy and the glorification of war form no part of the teaching given to their children is made clear by the following extract from the Socialist paper Gleichheit, in which a German woman writes as follows: "We must take care that the spirit of rudeness, barbarism, the setting of one nation against another, finds no place in the families of the people's class. The mothers must continually tell their children that the Russians, the French, and the British, who face the Germans and Austrians in the field, are doing nothing other than these are; that they, just as little as we, wanted war, and that they, just as much as our men, are fighting with the conviction that they have to defend their country with all their power. They must tell their children that each of the soldiers on the other side has also a mother at home who is anxious and weeps about him, that most of them have also left wife and children at home who daily repeat the question with quivering lips, 'Is father still living? Will he come back?' So must the mothers keep alive the humane spirit in their children, and make their hearts receptive for compassion and sympathy."

FRENCH PROFESSORS IN THE FIGHTING LINE.

M. Boutroux's lament, in a speech delivered recently to the old scholars of the École Normale Supérieure over the loss of French scholars and teachers which France has sustained during the war, must have moved his hearers deeply. This institution is a training school for teachers, and among 195 whom it has sent into the fighting line only 55 still remain safe and sound. M. Ernest Lavis, another French professor, echoed his words, but at the same time reminded the audience that those who returned from the war to be their educators would bring back something as a result of their experiences which would perhaps be some compensation for what the nation had sacrificed. "They know," he said "the necessity of a moral faith, of a consent to discipline, of an acceptance of sacrifice. They know many other things; they have seen the differences of character, political, social and religious, suppressed and repudiated before the enemy. They will be the preachers of brotherly tolerance. They will teach the generations of France victorious that we must still gain victories over ourselves, and that this kind of victory is fruitful also, and glorious. They will be the best teachers we have had."

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

OUR "Belgian Hospital Fund" has made splendid progress during the past week: 500 lb. of material has started on its way to the two hospitals mentioned in our appeal, including blankets, dressing-gowns, complete outfits for soldiers returning to duty, and comforts of various kinds. In addition, the supply of warm clothing has been so ample that Mrs. Allen has felt justified in sending some of the parcels which have been forwarded to her to the Queen of the Belgians, who has assured us through Madame Maton, her representative in London, that the soldiers in the trenches will get the goods at once. This does not mean that we have enough and to spare. We want more and still more. We have heard of several other small hospitals for Belgian soldiers where the need is very great, and we are taking steps to get into touch with them at once. Our fund to-day stands at £377. We want to make it at least £500 next week. Cheques and parcels should be sent to Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, London, N.W.

THE German Air Raid has come and gone, and given us a fresh taste of the realities of war. The daily Press has magnified it into an event of first-class importance, eclipsing the Russian victory in the Caucasus and the Italian earthquake in its demand for big type and lurid headlines. Apart from the serious loss of perspective which this induces in the public mind, almost encouraging the belief that a few bombs in England are equivalent to a battle in France, it helps a little to play the German game. If some of our newspapers of the last few days reach Germany, they will certainly encourage the idea that the experiment is worth repeating in order to confuse and paralyse our minds with terror and excitement. Competition in sensationalism is always a risky game, but it may easily become something worse during the slow progress of a long campaign, when we need above all things to observe a proper sense of proportion and to resist the temptation to become absorbed in the minor details which lie closest to ourselves.

No one, of course, will pretend that a raid of this kind is not a disturbing experience and an occasion for deep commiseration with those who suffer by it. But even if it became a weekly occurrence, as it is near the fighting line, it would have no military significance. Its object was not scouting, but the destruction of life and property, with the total lack of discrimination which is inevitable in the dark. It is the fine rule of our air service that men will return from perilous adventures without doing anything if, by reason of darkness or fog, they cannot be certain that they are fighting fair, and not inflicting wanton suffering upon the civilian population. The different policy pursued by the Germans is significant chiefly as a revelation of moral bluntness where the finer sensibilities are concerned. In abandoning the code of honour and consideration which has been accepted by all civilized countries they have inflicted serious injury upon their morale, from the highest command to the humblest private in the ranks. This is one of the stubborn facts which will make the terms of settlement much harder for us all when the day of settlement arrives.

WE are in close agreement with Mr. Stephen Graham in the plea which he made for a more intelligent understanding of Russia, at the National Liberal Club on Monday night. The distrust of Russia, he pointed out, which was abroad to-day was one of the most dangerous things, and it might even eventually frighten Russia into the arms of Germany. His advice was: "Go to Russia. Read Russian literature, but don't read Shaw on Russia, or, indeed, any pessimist on Russia." If we may judge by the rather unmannerly interruptions to which Mr. Graham was subjected by Mr. Zangwill and others among his audience, his words of warning are greatly needed. The Russian bureaucracy, dominated to a large extent by Prussian military ideals, has done many things which people of liberal sympathies in this country can neither forget nor forgive. The consequence is that men who should be foremost in creating bonds of sympathy have hardened their hearts. But Russian civilization, as a strong native product, is only just beginning to come into its own. In its religious sentiments and its social ideals it will be very different from our own, but it has in it the promise of something rich and beautiful, as its tribute to the common life of the world. With its strong instincts of compassion, it will offer a stout resistance to the domination of vulgar materialism and the creed of the super-man.

In presence of the appalling earthquake disaster in the Abruzzi, we can only send our deep and respectful sympathy to the Italian people. More than this we are not permitted to do at present, for its policy of neutrality makes it difficult for the Government of Italy to accept help from countries which might be suspected of inducing her to take sides by the pressure of philanthropy. The towns which have been destroyed or seriously injured lie off the beaten track, and are little known to tourists. One of them gave its name to Thomas of Celano, the friend and biographer of St. Francis, and the reputed author of the 'Dies Iræ,' the most splendid of mediæval hymns. Miss Macdonell, who has an intimate knowledge of the district and its people, and a few years ago published a delightful book about them, writes as follows in The Manchester Guardian. "Save in a few favoured spots, poverty of the sternest kind is the daily lot of the Abruzzesi. In many parts of the province life is only made possible by the hard labour of the women—who not only keep the homes, but build them—and by postal orders from the United States. The senders of the postal orders nearly always come home again. The people are unambitious in a material sense, yet extremely hardworking and of a brave frugality. They have the virtues of a mountain people: hardihood, pride, and hospitality."

PROFESSOR GREGORY has contributed an interesting article on 'Italian Earthquakes' to The Manchester Guardian. In 1783 South-Western Italy was quivering in what he calls "a seismic ague." In that year there were 949 earthquakes, and the disturbance continued for four years. The main shock, which devastated Messina and Calabria, was the first to be made the subject of scientific investigation. It has been discovered that, while some Italian earthquakes are of volcanic origin, most of them are due to movements of a non-volcanic character, which lead to the subsidence of the earth's crust. The article concludes with the following account of the earthquake of January 12:—

The earthquake that did such serious damage in Central Italy on Tuesday morning, so far as can be judged from the present information, is of the normal Italian type. It has long been recognized that most Italian earthquakes are produced near the crest of the Apennines, and travel westward. Avezzano, where 8,000 out of 9,000 inhabitants are reported to have been killed, is in West Abruzzi, near the middle line of the Apennines. According to the tables of Montessus de Ballore, the adjacent area is far less often disturbed by earthquakes than the Alban region to the west of Umbria; but Avezzano is probably in an area affected by subsidences, for it is on the north-western shore of Lake Fucino, which, like the other large lake basins of Italy, is a cauldron caused by the sinking of its floor. From this region the earthquake wave appears to have travelled westward. It was felt personally so far north as Grosato, eighty miles south of Florence, and as far southward as Naples. The first reports have come from the west of the Apennines, except for the news that it occasioned a stampede at Fermo, south of Ancona, on the Adriatic Coast. Instruments have recorded it throughout Italy, and as far away as Eskdalemuir, in Southern Scotland, and in the Isle of Wight. The earthquake, therefore, is one of those due to powerful and relatively deep-seated earth-movements, and not to the collapse of a superficial volcanic cavity, like those of Ischia.

THE United States is dealing with the problem of starvation in Belgium with a prompt generosity and a readiness of resource which are beyond praise. Offices have been established at the chief centres of population under joint Belgian and American management, and over 50,000 volunteers are helping in the work of relief. At present it is calculated that there are 1,400,000 persons entirely destitute, and it costs £660,000 a month to feed them. £200,000 is made by profits on sales of provisions to tradesmen, who sell them to people who are still able to buy, leaving £460,000 every month to be found by the charity of the world. In December it was calculated that a population of 650,000 remained in Brussels, and of these more than one-third, including 31,000 babies, had to be provided with food. In some of the industrial districts the proportion amounts to 60 per cent of the population. Such is the gigantic task to which American philanthropists have set their hands. It is pleasant to record that the German undertaking that imported food would not be seized for military purposes has been honourably observed. It is one gleam of light in a scene of devastation which, in its scientific barbarism and calculated indifference to every claim of humanity, has no parallel in history.

IN face of this colossal spectacle of misery the rise of the cost of living in our own country is a subject of quite minor importance. The economic state of the country is good, and unemployment is at a minimum. If there is any shortage of supply in normal comforts, we can all accept it without grumbling, and possibly find real compensations in a simpler scale of living. At the same time the increase in food prices is a matter which should receive the close attention of the Government. The withdrawal of competition in several directions, and increasing difficulties connected with transport, tend to force prices up in a way that can only be dealt with adequately by some measure of public control. We have a right to demand that the few shall not grow rich upon the needs of the many. Any restriction which may be placed upon competitive prices need not offend even the doctrinaire economist. His theories apply to peaceful commerce, and what we have to deal with is the highly artificial conditions of trade produced by the disturbance of war.

CARDINAL MERCIER is one of the figures who will emerge with added lustre from the horrors of the War. Long honoured by scholars, his noble solicitude for his people has made him the favourite of the crowd. When he was promoted from his professor's chair to the bishop's throne in 1906, the keen theologian developed, with an ease and rapidity which surprised even his friends, into the unwearied shepherd of souls. Here is a sketch of him by the Bishop of Salford, who was a fellow-student with him at Louvain forty years ago:—

The famous Pastoral, now causing so much excitement, is but the last of a long series of remarkably telling episcopal letters of the same kind, some of quite special merit, like the one on 'Patriotism' in 1910. Three volumes of these collected 'Œuvres Pastorales' were published in 1913. ... His indefatigable energy, self-denying labours, and severe ascetic life have set their unmistakable marks upon his strikingly tall and emaciated form, as all observed during the Eucharistic Congress in London in 1908. I remember a year later, at the jubilee of our common Alma Mater, venturing to remonstrate with my old fellow-student on his overworking himself, and predicting that his excessive labours would shorten his life. His Eminence's reply was characteristic of the man. "A bishop ought to die young," he said, with a wistful smile.

THE governors and trustees of the School of Irish Learning have shown a wise restraint, which is worthy of imitation, in their resolution accepting Prof. Kuno Meyer's resignation of his position as Director. In their deep disagreement with him, they cannot forget the benefits of the past or the bonds, independent of nationality, which are continually being forged by common studies and ideals. "It is impossible," they say, "in this time of sorrow to rehearse calmly the very signal services rendered to Celtic learning by Dr. Meyer, and more particularly his rare services to the Irish community of scholars. It is with sorrow that we contemplate this separation as one of the catastrophes of a war which has for a time divided nations and severed natural communications. We still hope that among the reconciling forces of the future none will be more powerful than the loyalty of scholars to one another and to their common service of truth."

"THE TOTAL FAILURE OF THE CHURCH."

THE title which we have placed at the head of this article is not of our own choosing. We have borrowed it from one of the weekly articles which the able writer, who calls himself "Artifex," contributes to The Manchester Guardian. We have borrowed it in order to examine it, for if the terrible indictment which it makes against the public practice of religion is true, all the churches of the land may as well close their doors and send their preachers and pastors to fill some more profitable calling. Clearly "Artifex" cannot mean anything quite so drastic, for, if report speaks truly, he himself has not abandoned the work of preaching. Probably he was consciously using the language of journalistic exaggeration in order to blacken the charge which he wants to bring against professing Christians, and in this way to drive it home. What, then, is the indictment which he demands that we shall answer at the bar of conscience? Briefly, it is this. The Church has failed because it did not prevent the War, and it is failing every day because it does not rebuke uncharitableness and ill will towards our enemies. When we speak about these things quite simply, without the vehemence of statement which is so wounding and unfair to thousands of good and holy souls, we are in close agreement with him. We need to realize how much better this world would have been, nobler in its joy and richer in its peace, if Christianity had remained true to its heavenly pattern, and had not forgotten the spiritual passion of its Master. We need, too, to reproach ourselves daily for our failure to keep our own hearts with all diligence, and to warn our friends and neighbours to be watchful at a time when sins against charity and justice abound. We ought to feel, even more than on ordinary days, how immeasurably we have fallen short of the high standard of Christian goodness.

But this is a very different thing from the dark pessimism which lurks in the phrase about total failure. Men are not necessarily lacking in humility because they cultivate the art of moral perspective, and even amid the tragedy of war remain deeply conscious that the Holy Spirit of love and power is still interceding in their hearts. If the one task committed to the Christian Church had been to place a veto upon war, and it had no vital concern with anything else, its voice would have been stifled long ago. None of us would have gracious memories of the religion of our own homes, or a present sense that prayer is really answered and sin is fully forgiven. But the presence of evil in the world, and our own failure to walk in the way of Christ, cannot silence the human cry for God or reduce the Gospel to a nullity even in ourselves. It dwells in us and sanctifies a fragment of life here and there, and makes us nobler men and women than we should be without it.

Or let us put the matter in another way. If we are to talk of a great war as though it involved total defeat for practising Christians, must we not use the same language in the case of all other forms of evil which are big enough to stir the imagination? Peace has its miseries as well as war. Times of great prosperity breed sins of selfishness and greed, of heartless luxury and sensual indulgence. The sweater's den and the brothel, no less than the battlefield, are abominations in the sight of God. But when these things weigh upon our hearts, and we feel the guilt of our own indifference, we do not at once jump to the conclusion that the teaching of the Christian Church is wholly without influence on the life of the nation, or abandon our ardent faith in the Kingdom of Heaven because it is not already here. The world is full of imperfect Christians like ourselves, who often do wrong and profane the holy name by which they are called, and yet are held firm in some of the ways of virtue by the hand of Christ; and all around us there is the great company of the faithful, who strive more successfully than we have ever done to subdue their base passions and to order their lives in lovingkindness and peace. Have our mentors who talk in a tone of sad impatience of the total failure of the teaching church at the present time forgotten all this? Are they wise, or fair, or even quite truthful, when they are blind to the good things which remain, so beautiful, so rich, so abundant,—the generosity, the eagerness to help, the modest courage, the patience in suffering, the quiet confidence that this visible world with its pleasures is not all? Have they forgotten that if we are something better than raw barbarians it is because we still carry the image of Christ in our hearts?

We have written in this way, not because we want to find easy excuses for our grave omissions of duty or to encourage the mood of self-righteousness, but in order to expose the fallacy which lurks behind a mood of spiritual depression. It is a mood which sees the whole of life morally defeated by the War, and keeps a sharp and critical ear for every harsh word and forbidding epithet which may betray the lurking spirit of hatred and ill will. We believe that we speak for a great company of our fellow-Christians when we say that we are not conscious of any sharp collapse of our faith. We do not spend our time in boasting what a fine nation we are, and still less in hating Germans and calling them names. We want to do our duty as simply and quietly as we can, and to put this business through with a strong hand and with as little suffering to the world as possible. We desire above all things to preserve unstained our feelings of honour, of chivalry to the weak, and of protective kindness to the unarmed. We recognize with heartfelt pride and gratitude that our people have kept their heads through trying days, and have been less subject to the coarser forms of war-fever than ever before. All this takes us into the sanctuary of religion, and makes it impossible for us to speak of the total failure of the whole body of practising Christians in England. We deprecate language of that kind, not because it is bad for recruiting, but because it is bad for our souls. With all our hearts we will confess that we are unworthy to be called the children of God, but nothing can annul the fact of His divine Fatherhood, which is either a living fact now or a dead dream for ever. Do we still feel that we are safe in His care? Does His compassion help to make us pitiful? Is service of the common cause, whatever it may cost, a better thing in our eyes than pleasing ourselves? If it is so, then for us, in spite of weakness and error and the far distance at which we stand from our heavenly aim, neither the pure Christianity of the Gospel, nor the Church which is the organ of its spirit has wholly failed.

AS GOD SEES.

VIEWED close, the rocks are jagged, dank, and drear :
Seaweed, bedraggled, like a clammy shroud Clings round them. Desolation, wreck, and fear Here haunt, and stalk forlorn, and shriek when winds are loud.

But when the blue is faintly fleeced o'er,
And warm haze drowns over land and sea, Viewed from the heights that overtop
the shore,
How tender-lined, rich-robed ! What grace and majesty !

O human wreckage from the storms up-cast !
Drift of what gallant craft that sailed so gay !
Man sees but splintered spar and riven mast :
But God sights distant ships sure sailing toward the Bay.

H. H. JOHNSON.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

THE RIDDLE OF THE WORLD.

THE riddle of the world is understood
Only by him who feels that God is good,
As only he can feel who makes His love
The ladder of his faith, and climbs above
On th' rounds of his best instincts ;
draws no line Between mere human goodness and divine,
But, judging God by what in him is best,
With a child's trust leans on a Father's breast,
And hears unmoved the old creeds babble still
Of kingly power and dread caprice of will,
Chary of blessing, prodigal of curse,
The pitiless doomsman of the universe.

So heard I ; and the chaos round me spread To light and order grew ; and " Lord," I said,
" Our sins are not tormentors, worst of all Felt in distrustful shame that dares not call Upon Thee as our Father. We have set A strange god up, but Thou remainest yet.

All that I feel of pity thou hast known Before I was ; my best is all Thy own.
From Thy great heart of goodness mine but drew Wishes and prayers ; but Thou, O Lord, wilt do,
In Thine own time, by ways I cannot see,
All that I feel when I am nearest Thee !"

WHITTIER.

BE NOT AFRAID TO PRAY.

BE not afraid to pray—to pray is right.
Pray, if thou canst, with hope ; but ever pray,
Though hope be weak, or sick with long delay :
Pray in the darkness, if there be no light.
Far is the time, remote from human sight,
When war and discord on the earth shall cease ;
Yet every prayer for universal peace
Avails the blessed time to expedite.
Whate'er is good to wish, ask that of Heaven,
Though it be what thou canst not hope to see :
Pray to be perfect, though material
heaven
Forbid the spirit so on earth to be :
But if for any wish thou darest not pray,
Then pray to God to cast that wish away.

HARTLEY COLERIDGE.

IN the obedience of faith we die to the narrowness of self-love, and our life being " hid with Christ in God," our hearts are enlarged towards mankind universally ; but many have departed from this true light of life, and stumbled on the dark mountains. That purity of life, which proceeds from faithfulness in following the pure spirit of truth, that state in which our minds are devoted to serve God, and all our wants are bounded by His wisdom, has often been opened to me as a place of retirement for the children of the light, in which we may be separated from that which disordereth and confuseth the affairs of society.

JOHN WOOLMAN.

O ETERNAL SPIRIT, who hast made the nearness of God to man the beginning of all religion, grant us in all love and obedience to be reckoned thy children, through that holy breathing of God, whereby the whole family of mankind is joined into one and sanctified.
Amen.

QUESTIONS AT ISSUE.

THE FUTURE OF ARMAMENTS.

IT is well that we should throw our thoughts forward into the future, and try to realize what changes are likely to take place in regard to the use and control of the armies and navies of the world. There are three possibilities that present themselves.

1. The first possibility is that the future in this respect will be much like the present and the past, the only difference being that, in the future, each nation will be more powerfully armed than hitherto. This prospect is not one that can be contemplated with any satisfaction. In all countries it has become increasingly felt that some means must be found, not only of reducing the tremendous financial burden which the nations have to bear in keeping up their several armaments, but of removing the constant danger to the peace of the world which the very existence of vast rival armaments involves. We may, therefore, regard it as intolerable to the common sense of mankind that things will go on for ever just as they have been going, and that such a catastrophe as is now happening will happen again and again till the end of time.

2. The second possibility is that armaments have no future at all—or, at any rate, ought to have none. Those who take this view do so, as a rule, on religious grounds. They hold that the existence of armies and navies is an anomaly in Christian civilisation, and a direct contradiction to the teaching of Jesus in the Sermon on the Mount.
How, they ask, is it possible to reconcile the possession and use of these things with Christ's doctrine of non-resistance ?
Should not nations which employ such things abandon all pretence of being Christian ? And ought not individuals who help to support armaments by taxation and in other ways confess frankly that they are not followers of Christ ? These are questions that are weighing heavily on many sensitive souls, and we should consider carefully, and with an open mind, what our attitude should be in regard to them. If Tolstoy was right in maintaining that the doctrine of non-resistance, as understood by him, is of the very essence and substance of Christianity, then let us have done with all hesitations and compromises, and either accept the doctrine and all its implications as to the folly and wickedness of using force, or, on the other hand, let us reject the doctrine as unreasonable and impracticable.
There is here a clear issue, and one of far-reaching national and personal importance, and before taking one side or the other we ought to be very sure of the grounds on which we do so.

Was the doctrine of non-resistance, as taught by Jesus, meant to be practised by his disciples always and on every occasion ? We know that he did not practise it on every occasion himself, for did he not, with a whip of small cords, drive the money-changers from the Temple courts? Some may say that this was a case in which even his human nature, otherwise so perfectly controlled, got the better of his higher will and judgment. But, for my own part, I prefer to think that his doctrine of non-resistance was not to be understood as an absolute law of universal application, but rather as advice suited to certain easily conceivable circumstances. We have to remember that the early Christians were non-resisters out of sheer necessity; resistance to what were deemed the evil powers, and more especially to Roman authority, would, even if exercised by a few individuals, have endangered the life of the whole Christian community. But besides bearing in mind the non-combatant condition of the early Church, we have also to remember that the words of Jesus about non-resistance may be taken as indicating the spirit and temper in which he desired his disciples to live, rather than as supplying a hard-and-fast rule of conduct. Every one agrees that some of the sayings in that very passage of the Sermon on the Mount in which non-resistance is inculcated are to be taken in the spirit rather than in the letter. Who is there that accepts literally the saying that if any one takes your coat you are to let him have your cloak also? or if he compels you to go a mile with him you are to go two? What Jesus meant to teach his disciples by such sayings was, that they were not to be niggardly and grudging in their dealings with men, and that instead of interpreting their duty to others in a narrow legal spirit, and doing just what they had to do or were expected to do and no more, they were to think and act in a generous manner. So the saying "Resist not evil" must be understood as the Master's protest against the spirit which is too ready in taking offence and in seeking redress, and as a counsel to his followers to live among men in a spirit of generous confidence in their goodwill. He knew that the surest way to create enemies is to harbour suspicion and resentment in our own hearts; that the way to make friends is to be friendly. But he knew also that real offences, real acts of malice and injustice, do occasionally take place, and he pronounced woe upon any one by whom they are done.

Thus it does not appear to me that the plea for the disuse of force, either in personal or national life, is justified by appeal to the teaching or example of Jesus.

3. We come now to consider the third alternative, which is that, in the future, armaments will be formed into an international police under the control of an international Court of Justice. There are many signs that the tendency of things is in this direction. It is surely reasonable to suppose that the pressure of the same needs and circumstances which led men to organize civil courts and civil police must lead them by and by to organize an international court and an international police. Let us think, therefore, of what those needs and circumstances were.

The state of things previous to the establishment of the police court and the advent of the policeman meant a good deal of hardship for peaceable, well-disposed people. In a sense other than that in which we use the phrase now, every man's house was his castle, and much of his resources had to be spent in defending it from the possible aggression of his neighbours. He had to make its walls thick and strong, and to keep them in good repair. He required an armoury, stocked with the best weapons available, and had to hire watchmen to guard his property by night and day. Now, it is easy to imagine that the upkeep of these means of defence came at last to be very costly. The householder felt that he must not fall behind his neighbours in ability to resist attack. If his neighbours got a more up-to-date and effective kind of weapon he had to get one of the same—or a better, if possible; if his neighbours engaged three watchmen he had to engage three or more; and, of course, he had no sooner outdone his neighbours than they set themselves to outdo him; so the rivalry went on, and so, too, the expenditure increased, till he began to feel that it was becoming greater than he could bear: he began, as we say, to groan under the burden of armaments. Nor did it help matters much, except temporarily, when he entered into agreement with some friendly neighbour, so that if one were attacked the other should come to his support and join in punishing the aggressor; for he could not count on the perpetuity of his neighbour's friendship, or on his ability to assist him just when the need arose. Besides, it was open to other neighbours to form alliances against him and his friend. Thus the situation developed into a rivalry of groups instead of individuals, and into a struggle to maintain the balance of power. But, although these neighbourly alliances did not appreciably lessen the expenditure on weapons and watchmen that each householder had to bear, they prepared the way for some better arrangement. They gave men experience of working together for their common defence, and suggested a method in which such common action might be made permanent and more effective, and have more regard to the demands of justice. Thus it dawned upon them that the best way of settling their disputes would be by establishing a court of arbitration, to which each of them might appeal whenever he felt himself aggrieved. It was realised that a man was not, as a rule, an impartial judge where his own interests were concerned, more especially in moments of sudden anger, and also that he was not necessarily the fittest person to defend himself or to obtain redress. On the spur of the moment he might commit an assault which he would afterwards regret; and in another case, even when convinced after due deliberation that a wrong had been done to him, he might not have the ability to obtain satisfaction. Thus he agreed that it would be best to let the Court not only decide the dispute between him and his neighbour, but to leave it also to enforce its decisions by means of policemen who should be under its control. He believed that this would not only be the fairest, but that it would be the most economical method of arranging the matter. What he had to pay as his share in taxation for the upkeep of the Court and the Police Force would be trifling as compared with what he was now paying for arms and watchmen and other means of defence. And experience justified his expectation that he would have far greater security, and have it at far less cost, than under the old system of personal defence. In other ways, too, it proved more satisfactory. Under the old conditions, when two neighbours quarrelled, it was not unusual for the persons and property of people who had nothing to do with the dispute to suffer from the missiles that were flung, and for the whole life and traffic of the district to be upset. This must have been felt to be an intolerable nuisance, even though it may have been welcomed by some as a not unpleasant diversion in a quiet and humdrum existence, and there must have been deep and general satisfaction when a body of men was set apart to keep the peace.

Now it seems to me that all this history is going to repeat itself on the international scale. As I have already expressed it, the pressure of the same needs and circumstances which have led individuals to create civil courts and civil police must lead nations to create an international court and an international police, and, indeed, is leading them even now. There are many evidences of this pressure, both economic and moral. Among them there is the complaint that has been raised in all civilised countries about the burden of armaments; there is the realisation of the extent to which a war, even between two small nations, causes disturbance to the trade and commerce of the world; there is the obvious fact that nations which are weak in armaments have little chance of fair treatment when a dispute arises between them and their more powerful neighbours. To all this dissatisfaction with the present system an International Court and an International Police seem the only possible remedy, and a few words may suffice to indicate that these things are coming.

There are those who appear to regard the Hague Tribunal as a failure, and it is true that it has not prevented the present war, and that its conventions have been violated most unblushingly. But no doubt the first civil court was looked upon as a failure by some, and was equally powerless to prevent people from settling their quarrels in the old way. Yet it survived its early untoward experiences, and is now broad-based on the will of all civilised peoples. And the Hague Court has every likelihood of survival and of universal acceptance. It will emerge, when the present crisis is over, more strongly supported than it was before, and ready, perhaps, to take upon itself other duties besides the merely judicial ones in which it has hitherto been engaged. For it seems inevitable that the Court should by and by be entrusted with executive as well as legislative functions. The first step towards giving the Court these executive functions will be taken when the Powers which sign the Hague rules shall not only agree to observe them, but shall pledge themselves to punish any violation of them. It should be the endeavour of peace lovers in all countries to persuade their Governments to take this step. In doing this they would be bringing nearer the time when the Hague Court will take its proper place in human affairs. What Bishop Butler said of conscience may, with equal truth, be said of that Court: "To preside and govern, from the very nature and constitution of man, belongs to it. Had it strength, as it has right; had it power, as it has manifest authority, it would absolutely govern the world."

To endow the Hague Court with "power" and "strength" is, in other words, to give it control of the armies and navies of the world. This may not come about very soon. Probably for a long time to come the individual nations will retain their separate armaments, but with a new sense of the sanctity of international law born of the present world-travail, and with an ever-increasing disposition to act in concert, ententes and alliances will develop more and more into permanent arbitration treaties. In these and such-like ways the nations will find their different armaments gradually coalescing into a single force for the preservation of the peace of the world.

THE BELGIAN HOSPITAL FUND.

SIR,—The prompt and generous response of your readers to my appeal and the promises of further help have made it possible for me to send out at once the things most urgently needed at the two hospitals of which I wrote, and to express the hope that we shall be able to keep them supplied with outfits for the men as long as may be necessary. Moreover, as many people have said in their letters that they hoped I would use their gifts in whatever way I thought most useful, I think I shall be fulfilling their wishes by enlarging the original scope of the Fund. I have therefore arranged to send immediately to the Queen of the Belgians, through Madame Maton, a gift of warm clothing to the men already at the front. I have received such a splendid number of warm articles of clothing that it seemed best to let the men have them at once, as we have only about three months more of winter to face. I have been much touched by the warmheartedness of the letters I have received from all parts of the British Isles, and I only wish I had time to write to every kind donor. One scarf came from an old lady of 93, knitted by herself; another from a little boy of 12, who had learnt knitting on purpose to make it. The children of a Sunday School gave up their Christmas party and sent the money instead. These are but a few instances of the sympathy which the appeal has evoked. May I say in conclusion that I have received to-day a list of several small hospitals similar to, and near by, those we are already helping, and I am making arrangements to supply their needs as well. I shall accordingly be glad to draw upon the generosity of your readers still further. What we can do to help is only limited by the supplies of money and clothing at the disposal of our Fund.—Yours, &c.

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

SIR,—As the average Englishman dearly loves to find a precedent for any line of action that he adopts, it may help to decide whether the National Conference shall be held this year to note that in 1781, when the country was still at war with its American colonies, a conference of ministers was held at Bradford, and a sermon was preached by the Rev. Wm. Wood, minister of Mill Hill Chapel, Leeds.—Yours, &c.,

DISEASE ON THE BATTLEFIELD.

SIR,—The ingenious device of Prof. Sims Woodhead, by which he says it is possible to render even a highly polluted water perfectly safe for drinking purposes, should be of inestimable value to our troops and those of our Allies. His method of bacteriological sterilisation consists in the introduction of an infinitesimal trace of chlorine into the contaminated water. It effectively destroys all disease-producing bacilli—those to the presence of which typhoid, cholera, dysentery, &c., are attributed—in from 15 to 20 minutes, and is so potent a bactericide that in some water as little as 1 part of chlorine (hypochlorous acid) in 7,000,000 is sufficient for the purpose. The tedious bacteriological examination of water, taking from 24 to 96 hours, is superseded, as the amount of bleaching powder required to render the water safe for drinking may be determined in 20 minutes. Two grammes (30 grains) of chloride of lime (hypochlorite of lime) is sufficient to sterilize 110–120 gallons of water.

This most valuable discovery is doubtless being considered by the War Department, if not already in use, and will, it is to be hoped, supersede—by rendering needless—the objectionable practice of subjecting the soldiers to inoculation, with the risks it involves of disabling some for service and the possible after-effects which no human insight can calculate.

Typhoid—to which more of our British soldiers fell victims in the South African War than to Boer bullets—is, according to scientific authority, almost always due to a water-borne bacillus, and the remarkable immunity of the Japanese troops from typhoid during the Russo-Japanese War, though anti-typhoid inoculations were not practised upon them, is attributed to their having lamps and kettles, and being obliged to boil all water for internal use. The insanitary conditions inevitable on battlefields make epidemic disease almost a more deadly menace than the destructive resources of the enemy, hence the discovery of any easily practicable method of security against it is an extreme benefaction to the human race.—Yours, &c.

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

DR. FIGGIS AS A MODERNIST.

The Fellowship of the Mystery. By John Neville Figgis, Litt.D. London: Longmans Green & Co., 5s. net.

THIS volume contains the Bishop Paddock Lectures delivered in New York in 1913. It is in many respects the best book on religion which Dr. Figgis has written. It contains more of the balanced judgment of the historian and less of the vehemence of the controversialist. Of course, the Catholic position is fundamentally the same, but his judgments are juster, and in consequence there is a gain in spiritual insight and religious sympathy. He even goes a long way to meet the modernists in the admission that the theology of the creeds is by no means perfect in expression, and administers a firm rebuke to the orthodox apologist who denies that any problem exists.

"The problem which the modernists tried to face," he says, "is real. Changes of a very definite nature have come over our way of thought; and not all of them are transient. While holding fast to the 'Eternal Gospel,' there is before us in this age the task, not yet accomplished, of adjusting to a theology framed in another intellectual climate a new view of the Bible, enlarged conceptions of history, and deeper knowledge of the natural world and of the mind of man. 'Mediating liberalism' is perhaps the best term in which to describe the attitude of wisdom; for that implies a real reverence for the heritage that is ours, together with an alert openness to what is new."

Dr. Figgis as a mediating liberal is a refreshing change. The familiar emphasis upon the value of the living Christian society is present in undiminished force, but it is coupled with the warning that "mere historic sentiment is not enough for a living religion; nor is it even necessarily Christian.... We cannot live at second-hand; and echoes, even of church bells, will not redeem us." Elsewhere he denies infallibility to the authority of the Church "in its ordinary sense of the guaranteed accuracy of formal propositions," and he deprecates strongly the Anglican tendency to attach too much importance to the decisions of councils. "It is to Christ that is due the loyalty of the Christian, and through Him to that living society which is inspired by His Spirit; but it is the living body, not the society as it was some centuries ago, or little pieces broken off from its life."

We agree entirely with Dr. Figgis that the extreme modernists were in error when they tried to preserve Christianity as a form of spiritual idealism independent of history. There is no salvation to be found in extreme subjectivity, and any religious movement which puts its trust in it must wither and die. But this does not prevent his cordial assent to one of the primary articles of the modernist school as represented by Father Tyrrell.

"They carried," he says, "the notion of the Divine Immanence to the extreme; but on the ethics of conformity they were in the main right, and were nearer to a true conception of authority than their adversaries. Modernist thinkers are justified when they say that loyalty to the formularies of the Church does not mean the assent to an aggregate of isolated statements, each in a pigeon-hole, but rather the submission to that majestic communal life of which creeds are the expression."

This whole treatment of the question of authority is so fresh and suggestive that we hope Dr. Figgis will soon take it up again more in detail. All that he says about the authority of the Christian society has great weight, but he does not make it clear how it can guarantee historical events. This for many people is the crucial difficulty of the whole position. They feel instinctively, and they are right to do so, that they must preserve their contact with the creative facts from which the Christian experience took its rise; but they hardly know what to answer when they are told that their dearest affections may be placed in jeopardy at any moment by a clever historical critic. We cannot dismiss either history or experience without committing spiritual suicide. What we need is some more adequate expression of their necessary connection and inner harmony.

TWO BOOKS ABOUT THE WAR.

THE war is producing a paralysis of literary activity. It is true that the bookstalls groan under the weight of books that are no books, and there has been a remarkable revival of the pamphlet. The "Oxford Pamphlets" have enlisted the services of the best minds of the University, and "Papers for War-Time," under the able editorship of the Rev. William Temple, have cast their net rather wider, while presuming a predominantly spiritual interest. But what most people need is adequate knowledge of the social and political history of Europe to enable them to correct the prejudice of mere opinion on one side or the other. For this purpose two small books may be cordially recommended. The Origins of the War, by J. Holland Rose, Litt.D. (Cambridge University Press, 2s. net), contains a course of lectures, delivered last term. It is a brilliant attempt to set the political aims and the clash of interests of the European States in the last forty years in their true perspective. The other book is The War and Democracy (Macmillan & Co., 2s. net), in which Messrs. Seton-Watson, J. Dover Wilson, A. E. Zimmermann, and Arthur Greenwood have collaborated. It contains admirable studies, mainly on the political side, of Germany, Austria-Hungary and the Southern Slavs, and Russia. It also enters the domain of prophecy, but prophecy based upon a sober knowledge of history, in a discussion of the issues of the war from the point of view of racial affinity and national ambition, and also in its social and economic aspects. Apart from careful study of the factors engaged in the struggle, to which books like these invite us, moral reflections upon what ought to happen tend to lose all contact with reality. Hard fact is also an excellent astringent for the mind when we are exposed on every side to the pitfalls of emotional excitement.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

THE SCHOOLING OF A HERO.

It is just a hundred miles from Nice to Genoa along the beautiful Mediterranean shore, and about the year of Waterloo two boys, both named Joseph, lived at either end of this line: at Genoa, Joseph Mazzini, the doctor's son; at Nice, Joseph Garibaldi, the son of a sailor. Every inch of him a child of the sea, he swam like a fish, and at 8 rescued a poor woman from drowning—the first of sixteen whose lives he thus saved. The chum of the fishermen, he was off with them to the oyster trawl, to the tunny festival, and the sardine haul. He picked up all their sea-songs, and sang them with a lovely voice. At 15 the waves called him finally from his books. He and some schoolmates seized a boat, and, taking provisions and fishing tackle, sailed away eastward to seek adventure. But the runaways were pursued and restored to their homes. Garibaldi's father had the good sense, however, to profit by the hint, and sent Giuseppe to sea as a cabin-boy. During the next ten years he not only rose to be captain, but went through every kind of romantic adventure on the way. No voyager in those days dare sail the Mediterranean unarmed. Fierce Greek sea-rovers and ruthless Turks infested its waters. Three times was young Garibaldi captured and robbed by pirates. Once, while on his father's little barque, he visited Rome, and the vision of the Eternal City inspired his imagination for the rest of his life. Thrice afterwards he saw the city he defended, and now his statue stands on the Janiculum.

Events not less important, both for himself and Italy, happened during his apprenticeship to the sea. Garibaldi met Mazzini at Marseilles, joined the patriotic party of "Young Italy," and as a consequence had the exciting experience of reading his own name for the first time in print amongst the conspirators condemned to death by the Government. It was time to go elsewhere.

He sailed for South America, yet not, like many a colonist, in search of a fortune. "We are destined to greater things," he wrote to a friend. It was true, and Garibaldi had entered on the next stage of his training for the great part he would one day be called on to play. He was twenty-nine years old. Hitherto his schooling had been upon the sea. For the next twelve years it was to be continued on the breezy pampas of Southern Brazil. These fine uplands, covered with short grass and intersected by deep river gorges, by dense forests and mountain ridges, was then the haunt of herds of wild horses and cattle, of antelopes and ostriches. It was also the playground of straight-limbed, dauntless men. Many Italian exiles were already there, but Garibaldi, the sea-captain with the lion's face and the long, loose curls of gold-brown hair, soon became their leader. These sinewy adventurers were marvellous horsemen and hunters with the lasso. But there was a nobler motion in their hearts, and while the flying horse and the swift-footed ostrich afforded them a thrilling chase, they devoted their fearless strength to fight for freedom. Some Portuguese settlers not far away were trying to get free from Brazil, and set up a little republic of their own. Better to die for freedom than to live a slave. So Garibaldi, with his "Italian Legion," offered their services. They fought, they suffered, they endured, but they asked for no reward. Once Garibaldi was captured and tortured. He suffered "such agonies," he says, as "cannot be described." Yet when, afterwards, his pitiless foe fell into his hands, he would not look at him, but ordered him to be set free on the spot.

Then the great-hearted soldier won his chief and bravest recruit, the girl Anita, to be his heroic wife. She was tender and brave as he. A perfect rider, she accompanied her husband to battle; she was the inspiration of the camp, she nursed the men when sick or wounded, and, when Garibaldi was absent, led his soldiers to the fight. After one unfortunate encounter she was captured, and Garibaldi was missing. Fearing he was slain, she obtained leave to search the battlefield. His was not among the faces of the dead. Anita slipped away from her drunken guards, and on a spirited horse fled for four days without food through the forests, over sixty miles of the most dangerous deserts, swimming with her horse great rivers in flood, and so frightening the hostile pickets that they fled in panic from the apparition, until she reached a town where her husband rejoined her. Later Garibaldi and his legion saved Monte Video in a war against the Argentine. Their standard was a black flag with a burning volcano in the centre—the emblem of Italy mourning, but with the sacred fire of hope in her heart. Thus the schooling of the patriots was accomplished, and in due season the opportunity arrived for Garibaldi and his sixty-three "Red Shirts" to return to Italy, prepared to fight still sterner battles for liberty there. On the voyage across the Atlantic, each evening as the sun went down in the ocean they stood in a circle on the deck of the Speranza, and "sang for evening prayer a patriotic hymn."

RELIGIOUS EDUCATION.

REPORT BY THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

THE COMMITTEE of the Sunday School Association has lately considered a suggestion that the "Graded Course" or the "International Bible Lessons" might be used in some way for our Schools. After careful consideration the Committee felt unable to adopt the suggestion. The following abstract of the memorandum drawn up in reply may be of interest to superintendents and teachers.

The subjects chosen in both the courses are necessarily intended to bring out the points of the orthodox faith, and even if the readings and headings were adopted and the lessons rewritten, from our point of view the result would not be satisfactory. It would probably give the children an idea of what we do not believe, but such teaching would refer mainly to the points on which we either agree or disagree with orthodoxy, and it would not give a proper scope for those points which lie outside the orthodox mind. A considerable number of the subjects and many of the pictures are quite unsuitable. As a typical instance, out of twelve pictures on one sheet six could not have been used. Even if other lessons were put in their place the continuity would be disturbed, and the very advantage of a carefully arranged scheme over isolated lessons would be lost.

To adopt or to adapt an orthodox scheme could hardly be regarded as a sign of strength. In view of our faith, it would be much wiser to arrange our religious education on a basis of our own. Neither of the courses has for us any great merit. One is not graded at all, and the other, in the main, as to the Primary work only. Both consist almost entirely of lessons based on readings from the Bible, and they apparently aim at giving the scholars a knowledge of the Bible generally, without much regard to the value of the different parts in helping our young people to build up their character and religious life. It is also open to question whether readings from the Bible, often difficult to understand and needing much explanation, are the best means of explaining a point to children. There is some danger that the necessity of finding a text suitable both for the subject and for the child of a particular age may cramp the teaching of the more modern ideas. The liberty and truth for which we stand should be inculcated, not merely by direct teaching, but indirectly, by introducing material of a religious and moral nature from all possible sources—not only incidentally, but as the substantive lesson itself.

There may be a certain advantage in using a scheme which is being taught in the orthodox Schools so as to warn our scholars against outworn beliefs. It will, however, be conceded that our object is religious education, not controversial propaganda. We do not want to make our children into disputants. Against the danger of attempts to convert them the best defence is a strong faith of their own, and especially a firm grasp of the underlying principles and of their application. That is better than any mere warnings. Older children could now and then be advised how to meet the usual arguments and to answer the usual questions, and how to give a reason to orthodox people for the faith that is in them.

There is considerable danger of confusion to our teachers and scholars if orthodox ideas or pictures are mixed up with our lesson-notes, as they would probably be if a modified scheme were adopted. The greatest need in education is absolute clearness. The best way is to present a lucid, convincing impression of our own, and to let it work itself deep into the child's mind.

The Committee have, therefore, come to the conclusion that greater good will result from an attempt to lay down the main principles of a religious education fitted for our own Schools.

In order to carry out this idea a pamphlet entitled 'Religious Education: Some Principles and Suggestions' is in preparation. Its aim is to bring modern teaching ideas and the results of child-study more within reach of the teachers, and to adapt these ideas so far as necessary to our own needs.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Birmingham.—At a meeting of the Monthly Meeting of Protestant Dissenting Ministers of Warwickshire and Neighbouring Counties held on January 19 at the Church of the Messiah, Birmingham, eleven ministers being present, the following resolution was passed unanimously:—"That a strong and emphatic appeal be made to the Committee of the National Conference to reconsider their decision to postpone the Triennial Meeting. In the opinion of this meeting of ministers, the Conference should undoubtedly be held, even if in a modified form."

Cambridge.—The Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association are continuing to render substantial financial aid in support of the religious services held during the University terms at Cambridge. Several graduates and undergraduates have enlisted for the war, but the attendances at the services last term were very little below the average of former years. The preachers for the present term, from January 24 to March 14, are as follows: Dr. Carpenter, the Revs. F. K. Freeston, H. Gow, W. G. Tarrant, Basil Martin, R. Nicol Cross, H. McLachlan, and Dr. Jacks. Ministers of congregations who know of any young men or women now at the University are desired to send their names and colleges to the Acting Hon. Secretary, Mr. H. G. Green, Gonville and Caius College, Cambridge.

Hindley.—The Rev. R. F. Rattray, at present assistant minister of Ullet Road Church, Liverpool, has accepted a unanimous invitation to become minister of Hindley Presbyterian Chapel.

London: Islington.—Unity Church has lost, by the death of Mr. Hugh Martineau on January 8, in his 81st year, one of its most faithful and generous members. Mr. Martineau always attended the morning services unless prevented by illness, and, in addition to other acts of unostentatious philanthropy, gave generous support to the London Domestic Missions and their institutions. He was descended from Gaston Martineau, the Huguenot refugee who settled at Norwich after the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes in 1685, and was the son of Mr. Peter Martineau, one of the founders of Unity Church, becoming with him a member of the Islington congregation when Essex Street Chapel was converted into Essex Hall. His mother was Mary Ann Ronalds, the last infant christened by Dr. Priestley before he went to America. Mr. Martineau died at 16, Highbury Terrace, the family home, where he was born.

London: Mansford Street.—It is announced that a Sacred Concert will be held in Mansford Street Church on January 28, at 8 o'clock, under the auspices of the Brotherhood of Arts, Crafts, and Industries War Service Committee. This Committee is "doing splendid work in some of the poorer districts of London, organizing entertainments to which the prices of admission are quite low, and at the same time providing work for many of the West-End artists who are without work owing to the War. A good opportunity is thus afforded of hearing the best classical works performed, and at the same time supporting a worthy cause.

Nantwich.—A tablet in memory of Philip Barker will be unveiled by the Right Hon. Sir John T. Brunner, Bart., on Wednesday, 27th inst., at 4 P.M. Chairmen: E. S. Houghton, Esq. Other speakers: J. F. L. Brunner, Esq., M.P., the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, B.A., H. Lang Jones, Esq., M.A., W. Harlock, Esq., J.P., the Revs. G. E. Evans, J. Morley Mills, G. Pogler, B.A. At 5 P.M. tea will be provided, and at 7 P.M. there will be a religious service conducted by the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, B.A.

Norwich.—Sunday evening, January 17, at the Octagon Chapel, was specially set apart for the welcome to new members, the preacher being the Rev. Lawrence Redfern. Previous to this service the minister had been holding a series of weekly Preparation Classes dealing with the history of the Unitarian Movement, its present aims and ideals, and the privileges and responsibilities of Church membership. Twenty new members were added to the membership roll, most of them being present members of the minister's Adult Class.

Southern Advisory Committee.—The Rev. E. G. Maurice and the Rev. H. Maguire, B.Sc., have satisfied the Southern Advisory Committee in connection with the National Conference as to their personal character and general fitness for ministerial work, and have received certificates accordingly.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

SONGS FOR SOLDIERS.

In spite of the well-intentioned efforts of Sir Charles Stanford and his City supporters the prospect of the men of the New Army taking to folk-songs and patriotic airs of bygone days is not very hopeful, and the suggestion that Mr. Rudyard Kipling should write new words to old tunes does not find favour either with the men or with such distinguished musicians as Mr. Landon Ronald. Kipling's verse is, it appears, lacking in rhythmic quality, which makes it difficult to set to music—that is Mr. Ronald's view; and, in addition to this, "Tommy Atkins" has no love of the poet who has labelled him with epithets which the public is too fond of repeating, and described his habits and temper in ballads which may be very entertaining, but are not true to type nowadays. One thing is clear, the modern soldier has no use for rhetoric, he cannot stand patriotic brag, and he prefers to go to his deadly work singing 'Tipperary' and other popular ditties which make no reference to war, because they keep up his spirits and help him to march well. Sir Charles Stanford wants something better, and would like to revive 'Lillibulero' and the 'Agin-court Song'; but in a matter of this kind it is useless to dictate to our young volunteers, though, of course, if they should take up 'Lillibulero' it would be quite in keeping with their present practice, for the famous anti-Jacobite ditty was simply the 'Tipperary' of its day, and the original words were sillier than those of the popular music-hall song.

THE FIRST PEACE SOCIETY.

In a recent article in The Manchester Guardian Mr. H. S. Perris stated that the world's first peace society was founded in New York in 1815. Mr. Bryce Leicester, of Birkenhead, has contested this statement, and seems to possess good evidence in support of his claim that the honour which has been given to New York belongs to the Liverpool Peace Society. He believes that, although the minute books of the present Society only date back to 1840, such a society existed at least thirty-one years prior to that date, perhaps earlier still, and quite likely in the closing years of the eighteenth century. "In support of the date 1809," he says, "I quote the following extract from a letter written by Mr. Richard Rathbone, the president, to Mr. Isaac B. Cooke, the secretary of the Liverpool Peace Society, and dated from the house of Dr. Reynolds, his brother-in-law, near Mold, on June 30, 1856: 'I became a member of the Liverpool Peace Society under our illustrious president, William Roscoe, in my twenty-first year, and I have now been a member for nearly fifty years.' According to the genealogical table in Mrs. Greg's volume entitled 'Reynolds-Rathbone Diaries and Letters,' Richard Rathbone was born in the year 1788, and would therefore enter on his 21st year in 1808. The letter above quoted is referred to in the annual report of the Liverpool Peace Society dated January 28, 1857."

RUSSIAN CHRISTMAS WITHOUT VODKA.

Mr. Stephen Graham gave an interesting description of 'Christmas Day in Russia' in The Times of January 7. "Christmas morning comes," he says; "the tables are piled heavily with roast goose, roast turkey, ham, sweet pastry, chocolates. The samovar hums. In come the village choir and an orchestra of violins and balalaikas and perform three or four pieces of national music, the National Anthem certainly. They kiss the good-man of the house, congratulate the women, take a snack of turkey and a glass of — tea. The village police come in, toppers to a man, and wish you well and cry 'God Save the Tsar,' and they drink a glass of — tea. The postmaster comes in, the manager of the vodka shop (now out of a job), the clergy, the baker, the grocer, the neighbours, and they embrace and sing and shout and talk and drink—glasses of tea, as it happens this year. To one who has lived through a village Christmas it is somewhat difficult to imagine Russia without vodka at Christmas. It has played such an enormous part in the festivity, not really a bad part, for there is so much goodwill and real hearty sociality at the Russian Christmas that drinking does not result in sottish drunkenness or crime. But there it is this year, a Christmas on tea! No vodka in the trenches either—cold, fatigue, weariness, badly healed wounds, semi-starvation, and no vodka to console, only the prayers and hopes and whispers of good talk between one friend in arms and another. In the trenches certainly it is well. And life is intoxicating enough with its hourly chances of death and glory. Sobriety will be saving grace to the Russians fighting this Christmas. The Germans are bound to try many surprises at the various points of attack, and try to catch the holiday-making Cossacks and peasant soldiers and their gay and gallant officers unawares. We shall, perhaps, observe the result of it in the news. With the soldiers sober, Russia is safer."

THE LONDON MUSEUM.

According to The Times, some very interesting additions have been made recently to the London Museum at Lancaster House, belonging chiefly to prehistoric times. There is amongst them the molar tooth of a mastodon, which may be roughly placed at anything from one to two million years. Numerous weapons of the Bronze, Early Iron, and other periods, some of which were found at Hammersmith, have been added to the collection of implements; and in the Roman London room is a burial group found at a depth of fifteen feet in Little Alies Street, White-chapel. This consists of two cinerary urns, an empty urn, a samian bowl, and an unguent bottle of glass, with a skull which was found just above the other objects. In the gold and silver room the most noteworthy addition is a large gold ring, inscribed "Ma souveraine," a favourite name among the Lancastrians for Margaret of Anjou, wife of Henry VI.

TEMPERANCE REFORM IN INDIA.

At a conference held at Shikarpur a short time ago, attended by delegates representing the various districts of the province of Sind, the following resolutions were passed: (1) That the Government be requested to insert lessons on abstinence in text-books for Sindhi and English schools; (2) that each school be provided with a magic lantern and some selected plates showing the evil effects of intoxicants; (3) strongly condemning the use of any kind of intoxicants on the occasion of marriages, &c.; (4) urging the delivery of public lectures against the habit of drinking at any time; and (5) calling upon the par-chayets (village councils) to interest themselves in the subject, and to disallow the performance of any religious ceremonies by Bavas or Brahmins who are not total abstainers. This Conference was interesting as having been arranged entirely by the Indian community. The proceedings, which lasted two days, were conducted in the vernacular language (Sindhi).

PRISON REFORM IN AMERICA.

Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, in the first instalment of his 'Western Wanderings' in The Cornhill Magazine, gives some interesting glimpses of prison life in America. Sing-Sing, about thirty miles from New York, is a place of horrible memories, which, he declares, a rich and progressive State should sweep away at once. With its inadequate accommodation and barred cells, 8 ft. by 3½ ft., not much improvement in the condition of the inmates is possible. But there is a most humane Acting Warden—a big, kindly Irish-American—who has done wonders. He knew nothing of prisons when he was given this position, but his warm heart and good sense carried him further than the wisdom of the experts. "Horried by the mass of misery before him, he set himself earnestly to alleviate it, and to humanise these poor brutalised creatures." The immediate result was a riot, in which the prison was set on fire by the inmates, who apparently distrusted his good intentions. Mr. Clancy quelled the disturbances, which in no way turned him from his kindly resolutions, and he has now softened the lot of the prisoners at every point. In the prison at Great Meadows (N.Y.) some astonishing experiments have been tried. "No arms are allowed to the wardens, there is no prison uniform, and the prisoners are allowed, not only to go freely about in the neighbourhood of the prison, but even to go unescorted for railway journeys of hundreds of miles. They become as attached to their life there as the Dartmoor convict who was released on the completion of his term, and was found sleeping in his cell next morning, having burgled the prison during the night."

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE harmony existing among the Allies has been illustrated this week by the visit of M. Millerand to London, and the cordial acknowledgment which it has called forth in the French press of the extent and the efficiency of the help which we are rendering to the common cause. Intrigue is one of the acknowledged methods of German warfare, and apparently it is one in which she has still great confidence; but all her attempts in this direction break down ignominiously. She is met at every point by complete unanimity and a resolution to stand together which is proof against all base suspicions.

THE bonds of this alliance are moral, and therefore they will stand a prolonged strain. We cannot remember any other example in history where elements of self-interest and the appetite for territory and power have played so small a part. It is possible that in the final settlement Russia may come nearer to some of her political dreams than ever before; but it is not these which are the primal motives of her warfare. If France recovers her lost provinces, that alone would not compensate her for her sacrifices, and it is something nobler than any thought of revanche which animates the whole nation. As for Belgium and ourselves, no one can even put into intelligible words any estimate of material gains which would have satisfied the war-makers of old. So far as we can see Belgium will be stripped of everything except her unconquerable soul, and we shall be left much poorer, with mourning and lamentation in our homes, and the proud memory that we tried to do our duty without counting the cost. The ties which bind us together have been cemented by the invisible loyalties of the spirit. This is a thought to kindle the imagination and stir the heart with a lofty sense of triumph even amidst the most desperate woes.

It is this note of moral idealism which is struck, full and clear, in the letter which M. Paul Sabatier has sent to the President of the International Society of Franciscan Studies at Assisi. The letter, which has been translated and appeared in The Times last week, is an answer to a peace memorial, rather vague and abstract in tone, which has been circulated by the Council of the Society among its members. To many people the most arresting thing about it will be the source from which it comes. No one who knows M. Sabatier, the breadth of his sympathies, the simplicity of his life, and the lofty idealism of his mind, will suspect him either of military fever or narrow patriotism. He is a keen warrior of the spirit, and just because he is this he is able to accept the facts without flinching, and to refuse to parley with any terms of peace which he feels would stain his soul.

THE letter begins with a heartfelt tribute to the nobility of spirit which animates the Belgian people.

The noble Belgian nation [he writes] is doubtless to be pitied, but it is still more to be admired. Its tribulations will pass, but its laurels will not fade. The Belgians went to certain destruction, with a firmness unexampled in history, in honour of a principle, whereas they might easily have secured handsome payment for granting a right of way through their country, and might also have made millions out of the German troops. Without a moment's hesitation, without giving a thought to these profits, they replied with a non possumus of which other nations have not, perhaps, understood the lofty heroism.

BUT the central interest of M. Sabatier's letter lies in the conviction that France is fighting in a religious spirit. "When a quarrel is for money, or for a strip of territory," he reminds his colleagues in the Franciscan Society, "one can make peace without moral loss. To make peace when an ideal is at stake is an abdication; even to think of it is to be false to the voice which tells us that man is born for other things than to enjoy the moral and material heritage of his fathers." "The peace which St. Francis preached was not peace at any price, peace as an end in itself.

Like many others before him, he repeated 'Righteousness and Peace have kissed each other'—righteousness first, and then peace. There is no true or lasting peace that is not based on justice."

AND so he closes this noble plea of the peacemaker on behalf of what he conceives to be a just and righteous war in the following words :—

This is what our soldiers—I see it by their letters—and what our peasants—I hear it in their talk—feel and understand better than I can express it. What France of the Crusades stammered, what France of the Revolution saw dimly, France to-day desires to accomplish. She believes with all her strength in victory, because she has indomitable faith in the ideal of justice and truth that is in her heart. But she does not need to believe in victory in order to fight, for to give up fighting would be to betray her past, her ideal, her vocation. What matter that she die at her task if she has done her work? The other day I read in a Swiss newspaper that one must go to France to see a people whom the War has not perturbed. It seems that in neutral Switzerland there is greater moral distress than in France. This is quite natural. In the ideal work we are now doing we have again found the secret of the life of nations—to labour together at a hard task, and to be faithful to the Spirit of Life that is embodied in the Creation. This is why I have found no trace of hatred of the enemy or wish for reprisals in the letters of our soldiers, who are enduring what they endure.

It will be remembered that M. Sabatier has been an occasional contributor to our columns. There are many admirers of his work among our readers; some of us are his personal friends. We are sure that we shall be fulfilling a common desire if we express to him our gratitude for his heartening words; and with our gratitude there may go a message of sympathy in his anxiety for his son Jacques, who is fighting in the first line in the Argonne.

* * *

The Daily Chronicle has published a long letter by Mr. John Galsworthy to M. André Chevrillon, a nephew of Taine, in which he draws a forcible contrast between the new Germany and the old. He pays a tribute to German patriotism, bravery, and self-sacrifice, but these things are combined with bureaucratic despotism and controlled by a domineering temper.

New Germany—how different from that old Germany of Goethe, Kant, Heine, Schiller!—exhibits all the characteristics that one may note in self-made men; overweening belief in self, in the ways and means of life that have made self so important and prosperous, great vigour and organizing capacity, overbearing manners, little regard for anything but success, a thorough belief that what is good for them is good for everybody, and that lack of psychological insight, tolerance, and sympathy with others which accompanies too great self-absorption.

Unfortunately, these characteristics are not confined to any single nation; everywhere they seem to dog the steps of material success. But when they prevail in large sections of the population, and enter into alliance with military ambitions, as they have done in modern Germany, they become a terrible menace to the world.

IN a later passage of his letter Mr. Galsworthy exposes the fallacy of the contention—so often heard in times of peace—that without military discipline we are liable to become soft and degenerate. The noble interests of life, its learning, its commerce, and its ideals of freedom and progress, do not make us unfit for hard tasks, as some theorists suppose.

The war [he says] has shown—as nothing else, perhaps, could—that, so far from being destructive agents, peaceful industry, humanism, freedom of thought and of life, have all the time, under the surface, been fostering high spirit, and capacity for self-sacrifice. The heroism of undisciplined, unmilitary, "degenerate" little Belgium has passed into a proverb. Can any Frenchman tell me when his "degenerate" country has behaved so well as in these sore days; shown herself so united, so high, so devoted, and so sober?

In my own "degenerate" land we are conscious of a spirit certainly as unflinching as of old and far more universally alive to duty than ever before. This will be apparent enough before we have done—we are slow starters, we islanders! The more peace-loving a people is, the more devotion does war require from it. "Ex nihilo nihil fit." If the social systems of our three "degenerate" countries had not secretly been storing virtue, such universal devotion could not have leaped forth. Yes! This war provides a powerful refutation of the theory, beloved of autocrats and militarists, that decadence is the child of Peace, Humanism, Commerce, and the arts. It gives living proof that if you seek virtue in the human creature you must not compel him to be virtuous; the flower of virtue has a deep and subtle growth—force it and you will get show blossoms for the moment, perhaps, but underneath a rankness or a weakened root.

A SECTION of the daily and weekly press acts in a curious way as a barometer of national nervousness, and the changes in pressure are often very startling.

Not many days ago some of these prophets were warning us that the mercury had gone down to "very stormy" in the matter of Anglo-American relations, and we were told in language, which did not err on the side of caution and good feeling, to be prepared for the worst. Suddenly the atmosphere seems to have cleared, apparently because Mr. Bryan has written a letter to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, in which he defines the duties of neutrality as accepted by the United States, and makes the following categorical statement :—"It is the business of belligerent operations on the high seas, not the duty of a neutral, to prevent contraband reaching the enemy. Those in this country who sympathize with Germany and Austria-Hungary appear to assume that some obligation rests upon this Government, in the performance of its neutral duty, to prevent all trade in contraband and thus to equalize the difference due to the relative naval strength of the belligerents. No such obligation exists. It would be an unneutral act of partiality on the part of this Government to adopt such a policy, if the Executive had the power to do so. If Germany and Austria-Hungary cannot import contraband from this country it is not because of that fact the duty of the United States to close its markets to the Allies. The markets of this country are open upon equal terms to all the world, to every nation, belligerent or neutral." This is both sound law and sound sense, and reveals once again the wisdom of taking scaremongers in the press at a good deal less than their own valuation. The United States Government has an exceedingly difficult duty to perform, and our own interests no less than the instincts of fair play demand that we should avoid everything that has the remotest resemblance to carping criticism or uncivil complaint.

WE have received a letter from Dr. W. Evans Darby—we regret that it is much too long for insertion—in which he combats the claim of the Liverpool Peace Society, referred to in 'Notes and Jottings' last week, to have been the first in the field. Dr. Darby's main contention is that this honour must be assigned to the New York Peace Society, which was founded in August, 1815; and that the Liverpool Society was founded in 1840 by William Rathbone and others, and not in 1809. From the point of view of accurate history of the Peace Movement the matter is of some importance, but we are afraid that we cannot open our columns to long letters on the documentary evidence just at present.

THE DUTY OF THE MOMENT.

WHILE the War suggests numerous problems for discussion, it confronts us with many practical duties. Of the two the latter are at the moment far the more important. We must do what we can to help, whatever view we may take of diplomatic history or abstract theories of non-resistance. For most of us the best contribution we can make to the future peace and brotherhood of the world is just to be kind, considerate, and generous to those who have suffered most grievously in defending their homes and fighting our battles. The response to our appeal for the Belgian wounded shows that many of our readers realize this very deeply. Their letters also reveal a feeling of gratification that there is one special department of service where just the kind of help is needed which they are able to supply. None of us can say that it is out of our power to give money and clothes while our own homes are still rich in comfort.

But this work of helping the Belgian hospitals, to which we have set our hands, is far bigger than appeared at first. We are not going to begin to talk yet of any limit to our resources, for we shall need them all; and we can assure every donor to our fund that the whole scheme has been well organized, with scrupulous attention to business detail. Already, through the kindness of a friend who was within sound of the guns last Tuesday, we have come into close contact with the superintendents of various small hospitals, and received from them lists of their urgent requirements. We have also been able to make satisfactory arrangements for the quick transit and delivery of our parcels. A large consignment which left London last Saturday was actually distributed in the hospitals on Sunday afternoon. A further consignment, including urgent hospital requisites, bandages, clinical thermometers, drugs, and various appliances for nursing, will be sent out in a few days.

As we announced last week, the large supply of warm clothing received enabled us to send some comforts direct to the Belgian soldiers in the trenches. This week we have been in personal touch with a Belgian officer who has been on a flying visit to England. A man of high courage and boundless good humour, who takes a deep personal interest in his men, he has undertaken to distribute the eighty parcels which are being forwarded to him. Every package contains a towel, a pair of socks, scarf, and woollen helmet, a quarter of a pound of chocolate, one candle, one box of matches, and a packet of boracic powder. All these have been carefully packed under the superintendence of Mrs. Bernard Allen and Miss Gertrude Martineau. At the express wish of Major —, who wished his men to have the feeling that some English friend has been caring for them, every parcel contains the name and address of one of our subscribers and a French letter of greeting, written by the boys and girls of the Fifth Form of the Hornsey County School, through the kindness of the Head-Master. We shall not be surprised if some of our readers receive letters of thanks from the trenches.

But this is only a pleasant incident in our work, and we record it here because of the human touch which means so much to men who hardly dare to think of their own devastated homes. Our chief concern is with the hospitals, and for this purpose we need all the help that we can get. We are only at the beginning of our work, and we are sure that it will not be allowed to flag if our readers, and all the friends whom they can urge to help us, will look in imagination into the deep gulf of misery and pain which we are trying to heal, or at least to comfort where we cannot cure. We give a little money or a little work where these men are giving their lives. But they do not look at it in that way. Their gratitude for our small efforts to befriend them is touching and overwhelming. Here is a translation of a letter of thanks, written by a doctor in one of the hospitals last Tuesday. More than any words of our own; it will urge the strong plea for further help, and help which must be plentiful and continuous if it is to be at all equal to the need.

"I am delighted [the letter says] to avail myself of the opportunity which is offered us to thank you. The gifts which you have been so kind as to collect for our sick and wounded have arrived at their destination in excellent condition. The distribution of them has already begun, and will be continued according to the needs of our patients. Our brave soldiers, many of whom have already had the opportunity of enjoying the benefits of English generosity, never grow weary in the praise and thanks which they express for our valiant allies. The great nation which has taken in hand the cause of the Belgians may rest assured that she is not conferring benefits upon ungrateful people. Our whole nation cherishes in its heart a gratitude which will not vanish with the last sounds of strife. Many of our soldiers have visited England and had experience of your kindness and your care. To those who cannot go your generosity sends everything which they could possibly expect to have if they had still a country of their own. Mr. —, who will be the bearer of this letter, will express to you better than I can do the thanks of our soldiers to yourself and to those who have helped you."

We hope that the tone of this letter and the speed with which it has reached us will at once deepen the sense of need, and inspire public confidence in the care which is being taken to distribute our help as quickly and as effectively as possible.

Good Thoughts for Civil Times.

DR. CHANNING AND NON-RESISTANCE.

"I received, and have read with much pleasure, the book you sent me on the 'Unlawfulness of War.' You ask my opinion on this subject. I agree with your author in everything but the main point. I abhor war as much as he does, but the view of its absolute "unlawfulness" I cannot accede to. I think my opinion of some weight, because my feelings carry me strongly to this doctrine, and nothing, it seems to me, but the power of truth prevents my joining the most rigid interpreters of the Christian precepts which relate to this subject. I think the author has erred fundamentally in supposing that we have nothing to do but to obey the laws of Christianity without reasoning about them, or that our religion prescribes acts or courses which we are to follow without a thought of consequences. Christianity does anything but lay down a precise law, telling us where to plant every footstep, and giving such plain prescriptions that we need only hear the words to receive their full significance immediately. Its laws are given in bold, and sometimes hyperbolic language, and require the constant exercise of good sense and reason to determine their precise import. Above all, they enjoin a spirit, or inward principle, leaving us very much to our own discretion as to the mode of applying it. The precept 'Resist not evil' is plainly to be understood with much limitation, for, were it literally followed, without exception, by the private individual and magistrate, all Government—domestic and civil—would cease, and society would fall a prey to its worst members. The precept was not intended to forbid all resistance, but to forbid the bad passions from which resistance generally springs. A discipline of the heart is enjoined, not any outward course. Christianity is intended to raise us to universal, unbounded love, and the only question is, whether war is inconsistent with this spirit. You may say it is. You may ask, How can I turn against one whom I sincerely love instruments of death? I answer, it is very possible to possess a sincere regard for the happiness of another being, sympathise strongly with his sufferings, and yet to subject him to severe suffering, and even to death.

How often does the judge pass sentence on a criminal for whom he feels deeply! I am to love the bad man; but I am also to love society, to love my family, my friends, my country; and if the bad man arm himself for the ruin of these I am bound to repel him. In so doing, do I not act from a principle of charity, especially if to save the good, to defend the community, I expose my own life in resisting the bad? I can certainly oppose a wicked man's purposes, and in so doing can inflict on him severe pain, without hating him, and even with the deepest grief for his character and punishment. I may even feel, through the strength of my philanthropy, a severer pain than I inflict. War, then, is not necessarily inconsistent with the spirit of Christian love. On the contrary, I fear that I should want this love were I to look quietly and unresistingly on the undisguised efforts of unprincipled men to spoil and enslave my country, my children—all who are especially confided to my care. War, then, is not absolutely, or in all possible cases, a crime. Here I dissent from your author....

"I know it is objected that, if any war is allowed to be just, all will be found so; that no lines can be drawn between the lawful and unlawful. So the fanatic says no line can be drawn between innocent indulgence and luxury, between moderate and excessive ornament, and therefore all indulgence and ornament must be renounced. I do not believe in the wisdom or virtue of escaping the labour and responsibility of moral discrimination by flying to an extreme principle. Every moral question is as open to this objection as war. Perhaps a sound mind can make the right distinctions on war as easily as on most of the solemn concerns of life."—From a Letter written to Miss Jane E. Roscoe of Liverpool, September 9, 1829.

A DIALOGUE BETWEEN THE SOUL AND THE BODY.

Soul. Ay me, poor soul, whom bound in sinful chains

This wretched body keeps against my will!

Body. Ay me, poor body, whom for all thy pains,

This froward soul causeless condemneth still.

Soul. Causeless? Whenas thou striv'st to sin each day!

Body. Causeless; whenas I strive thee to obey.

Soul. Thou art the means by which I fall to sin.

Body. Thou art the cause that sett'st this means a-work.

Soul. No part of thee that hath not faulty bin.

Body. I show the poison that in thee doth lurk.

Soul. I shall be pure whenso I part from thee.

Body. So were I now but that thou stainest me. A. W.

A PRAYER FOR TEMPERANCE.

O GOD, the Protector of all mankind, without Whom nothing is strong, nothing is holy, guard, we beseech Thee, the soldiers and sailors of our nation from the deadly evils that menace their souls. Open their eyes, that they may see the peril that lies in all forms of intemperance, and learn to fear it more than shot and shell. Strengthen their will to resist temptation; help them to realize that, if they give way, they can neither be strong to fight for their country nor holy to honour their God. To all their friends and relations give wisdom and courage to uphold them in their resistance, and to the whole heart of the nation bring home the necessity of removing this stumbling-block from the difficult path of its defenders, that we may each bear our part in strengthening their hands. For the love of Jesus Christ. Amen.

THE BLESSINGS OF PEACE.

THERE will be peace again in Europe some day—for a time. Meanwhile it would be well if we could make up our minds as to what we intend to do with it when it comes.

We are in the habit of speaking of peace—meaning thereby the mere abstention from military operations—as if it were an end in itself, a kind of final achievement. If the lion is lying down with the lamb, why ask for more? Why inquire too curiously whether the lion is filching the lamb's provender or monopolising the comforts of their joint establishment? The mere fact of peace, especially to peoples worn by the toils of war, looms so large and beneficent that it is difficult to appreciate its true meaning and value.

It is with peace as it is with freedom, of which we talk much in the same way. In both cases we are dealing with possibilities, preliminaries rather than achievements, opportunities which may or may not be put to good use. There is no magic in the state of peace in the sense above mentioned, by virtue of which human life will automatically become nobler and purer, or even happier. It is, of course, true that that state does make it easier for certain kinds of good to exist, but it is also true that it gives a better opportunity to certain kinds of evil than does the state of war.

There is a sense in which it is true that the "piping times of peace" are a more severe trial to human virtue than the stormy times of war. For the latter does, at least, force upon us a certain amount of self-sacrifice, loyalty, and patience, which the former leaves us much more free to practice or not as we think fit. To say this is not to deny that peace gives the opportunity for a higher general level of life than is possible in war. The point is that it is an opportunity only, and not until it is rightly seized and used ought we to begin to talk about the blessings of peace. The true blessings of peace are not certain to flow naturally from a state of peace. They are contingent upon the use we make of that state.

When, therefore, we pray "Give peace in our time, O Lord" we ought to follow up that prayer by our insistent questioning, "Why do we want it? Do we want it merely as an opportunity of pursuing our business and our pleasures, of growing richer and more comfortable without let or hindrance, or have we any nobler ends in view for ourselves and our country?" When we affirm "that the greatest interest of England is peace," let us honestly define what interest we really have at the back of our minds.

What are those real blessings which peace makes possible, but does not always bring? A steady increase of good will, honesty, and purity, a steady development of our powers mental, moral, and physical—education in the true sense of the word—a fair division of the opportunities and external goods of life, a dominance of what we call the spiritual over what we call the material interests of men, an ever-growing insight into the meaning and splendour of life. Surely these are of the type of true blessings, not mere wealth, political arrangements, command over the powers of nature or soulless efficiency, except in so far as they are made the means of attaining the higher ends. Have we, in truth, desired and striven for these true blessings with all our power in our times of peace?

If we look back upon the condition of England in June last it must be confessed that we had not been very successful. Was not luxury rampant, and were not the struggle for wealth and the love of comfort becoming more pronounced? Was not ill-will between party and party, class and class, sex and sex growing? Were purity and pity successfully dominating the lower elements of our nature? Were our cities at night, with their illuminated luxury and vice, becoming less like lurid scenes from the Inferno? It would be hard to give a satisfactory answer to such questions as these, hard indeed to maintain that we had made a good use of our time of peace. It would be more easy to maintain that our armed nation to-day, armed as we believe in a just cause, inspired by a great purpose, prepared for great sacrifices, stands on a higher moral and spiritual level than it did then; is even, despite the killing, the wounding, and the devastation of war, in a more truly Christian frame of mind. We are being brought back to the stern realities of life. We are being given the opportunity of learning in times of war lessons which we would not learn in times of peace, above all that of self-sacrifice, the subordination of our individual good to the general good, of petty personal aims to great ideals. We may be very thankful that war has come upon us in such a way that we can range ourselves in defence of high ideals, and not merely of personal aims and desires.

We shall get permanent peace when, and only when, the great majority of men really desire it for the sake of its true blessings—when, in short, we are fit for it.

We have often been told that in times of peace we should prepare for war. That is a doctrine which can only find its justification in the general unfitness to maintain and profit by a state of peace. It is much more safe to say that in this time of war it is our duty to prepare ourselves to make a proper use of the opportunities of peace when we have them once again. For if we do not they will be of but short duration.

THE FUTURE OF ARMAMENTS.

SIR,—Civilisation can only emerge from this war on a higher plane if men of goodwill (like Mr. Connell) will dispassionately consider the future. In his article he speaks of three possibilities, viz., increasing national forces, non-resistance, and an international police. I will confine my contribution to the discussion of the third alternative, viz., the creation of an international police under the control of an international court of justice. Before an international police can come into existence, there must be an international standpoint. Under internationalism a man may be a nationalist, but he must be a citizen of the world as well. Man qua man, irrespective of his place of origin, must be the equal of any other. There can be no colour bar, or most favoured nation advantages. Before the Hague Tribunal can exercise judicial, executive, and legislative functions binding upon the whole world, the several nations must surrender their sovereign powers in important directions. They must not maintain military forces of too great strength. (It is presumed that power would be retained to raise forces sufficiently strong to quell internal disturbance.) They must also forego protective tariffs and restrictions in regard to immigration. Meanwhile important changes would have taken place in the matter of Government. Where citizenship of the world was the rule, there could be no place for autocracies. The world would have become democratic. Possibly there would be a universal language. There would certainly require to be an international morality. Given these conditions, an international police force would be possible, but also unnecessary, unless its members performed the useful functions of tourist guides, regulators of traffic, and guardians of lost people.

Suppose an attempt were made at the close of the present war to internationalise force, would not the position of the world remain in statu quo? Nobody believes that the present distribution of political power is final. And yet which of the great powers would be prepared to surrender a man or ship? Germany made it clear in the spring of 1911 that she was opposed to arbitration on the ground that vital national interests could only be obtained by force. She furnishes the case of a great power dissatisfied with what she has. If the status quo proved repellent to great powers like Germany, what would be the attitude of dependencies like India, where the spirit of nationality is manifesting itself? It would appear that under these circumstances an international police force of the dimensions of a mighty army would be required.

It is worth while to discuss the functions, strength, training, and distribution of this international police force. Its very existence implies armed resistance to the decrees of the international tribunal. A nation numerically and financially strong could put a big army into the field, and prompt measures would be essential. An international police should not be scattered over the face of the earth, for points of concentration would be required from which expeditionary forces could be despatched. These forces would require to be very strong, and well trained. They would not be like our municipal police, strong because supported by the military, but themselves be made up of fighting men. Here countless difficulties emerge. Where would it be safe to concentrate international fighting men? Who would be the strategists and tacticians? What language would be employed? Would the soldiers be volunteers or conscripts? And would each nation have proportional representation? Last and most important—What spirit would animate the international police?

The problem of peace should be broken up into several parts, so that people of goodwill could seize upon the nearest and most convenient part, and make it a practical starting point. Ultimates provide the ideal element. While keeping these in sight, we must undertake the proximates, and thus make progress.—Yours, &c. WALTER SHORT.

Booth Free Church, Liverpool,
January 23, 1915.

SIR,—The nearest approach to a reply to my letter upon the 'Vision of Peace' is Mr. Connell's article on the above, especially the second possibility, that armaments have no future at all—or at any rate, ought to have none. And he suggests that Christ did not mean what he said, when he announced the doctrine of non-resistance. "Resist not evil" must only be understood as a protest, and it does not appear that the plea for the disuse of force is justified by an appeal to the teaching or example of Jesus. That is an astounding statement to make for a teacher of Christian gospel, and I want to ask Mr. Connell if, when Jesus was menaced in the garden, and he was in deadly peril—

a crisis so terrible that it moved his servant to draw sword, and strike a blow in his Master's defence—did he not rebuke the action, order the sheathing of the sword, and heal the wound inflicted? If he questions the incident, will he allow it as Christian teaching? Would Mr. Connell argue about the eighth Commandment as he does about the Sermon on the Mount, and say that the words "Thou shalt not kill" are no more than a mere protest? No, he would not. If there is any difference between the two, Moses and Jesus, and their sayings, which is the greatest? But over and above all is the example of Jesus, he would not take the sword in defence of the most righteous cause, but he could, and did, die for it. Are we not followers of him? And was this not the spirit of the early Christians, not so much a policy as a principle, "not accepting their deliverance, that they might obtain a better resurrection."—Yours, &c.,

THE TOTAL FAILURE OF THE CHURCH.

SIR,—When speaking of "the Church" as having failed at the present crisis, it seems to me that reference is made to that particular line of thought which is represented by Christianity, viz., the attitude of mind instilled by Christ, which results in a different kind of action from the one adopted by natural instinct. We may liken this different kind of influence in the world to a change such as the following. Several men are using pick-axes, and are laboriously hammering away at a huge rock. Another man comes along. "See," he says, "if I put this dynamite in here and set light to it. Come away, and look! all your work has been accomplished without your labour; there is a power of which you were ignorant, and you were therefore labouring in vain."

This simile illustrates what the Christian feels about acts of force to restrain force. He understands that there is working in the world a power of a different kind—a power that seems to contradict our ordinary calculations. Such a power he sees at work in the mother's love for her child. By means of this love she can cause to develop finer traits of character than anything mere discipline could produce. Such a power he sees again in the martyr, who, although death is instinctively feared by mankind, will walk bravely to the stake when he is faced with the alternative of giving up the truth according to his own conviction. So, again, the Christian thinker feels that the natural instinct to put up the fist when one is insulted can also be outweighed by the love of God; this being his method of expressing his experience that as his consciousness becomes more enlightened he is aware of some power which can and does overthrow the power of human mechanism, and in the presence of which the very desire to injure another human being is effaced.

It does not always follow that we can entirely carry out this theory in practice. Even the wise mother realizes that her two hot-blooded little sons are better sometimes when they have had a good fight and got over their anger. And in this sense we can understand how God allows earthquakes and wars in an, as yet, imperfect world. But the mother does not encourage her boys to fight, nor does she back up one child against another. I confess I tremble for the future of organised Christianity. Its anchor has been torn up and thrown away. The hold that it was regaining over the people by means of the scientific light thrown upon its base has been ruthlessly cast aside. In deep humility we bow our heads, trusting that this fire was needed to purge away the sins of our age of prosperity. We may realize that—perhaps not without justification—hot blood has got the upper hand for the moment, but let us no longer take part in this holocaust calling upon the name of the Christian religion.—Yours, &c.,

ANNE T. LAWRENCE.

A BETTER WAY THAN WAR.

SIR,—I was surprised to see in Mr. Connell's article of last week an attempt to reconcile Christianity with war, on the ground that Jesus used force to clear the money-changers out of the Temple Courts. Does any one suppose that a Galilean peasant could drive away a crowd of merchants or farmers with the aid of a small whip? Assuming, for the sake of argument, that the narrative is true, surely it is obvious that the only force used was spiritual, and that the whip was but a symbol of authority. But those who disbelieve in war are not all literalists like Tolstoy, nor do they depend on any particular interpretation of texts; they believe that the only redemptive power is love, that the only way of really conquering an enemy is by changing his heart, and that the only way of changing his heart is by patiently bearing wrong and persistently seeking his welfare. This they understand to be the way of the Cross, which seems to be folly, but in the end turns out to be the Wisdom of God.—Yours, &c.

BOOKSELLER AND POET.

THE last catalogue issued from 77, Charing Cross Road, is accompanied by a brief memorial sketch of Mr. Bertram Dobell, bookseller and man of letters, who died on December 14, 1914. Apart from his own claims as a poet, he will be remembered chiefly as the discoverer of James Thomson, the author of 'The City of Dreadful Night,' and of Thomas Traherne, the mystic, whose unsigned MSS. were redeemed from a street bookstall for a few pence. "Except that each is posthumously indebted to Mr. Dobell for the same service," says

Mr. S. Bradbury, in a pamphlet published a few years ago, entitled 'Bertram Dobell: Bookseller and Man of Letters,' which can still be obtained at 77, Charing Cross Road, "there is scarcely a point of similarity in the careers of the two men," and it is an eloquent testimony to the versatile tastes and sympathetic imagination of Mr. Dobell that he could devote so much thought and study to giving them their rightful place in English literature. Mr. Dobell also discovered the Strode manuscripts, the result of which was a notable addition to the literature of the early seventeenth century. Many unpublished poems written by this author had undoubtedly passed from hand to hand amongst the wits of his period, and much of his verse was published in various contemporary miscellanies, either with no name attached or bearing that of some other writer. The rest lay forgotten in some dusty nook until circumstances brought them into Mr. Dobell's hands. The restorer of these treasures had himself received little early education, and many were the struggles of his early life before he opened a little stationer's and news vendor's shop in Kentish Town at the age of 30. In after days, when he had become a well-known man, he said: "The thing that galled me when I was young was to be chained to a thankless and sordid trade where I could never call my brain my own; and if I have had one ambition gratified in life, it was to feel that I had justified my life by doing some good to other men, and, above all, to that fine, sad singer." He had many distinguished friends and correspondents, who valued him for the insight of his literary judgments and a bracing absence of conventionality in his opinions. The following lines—the last he ever composed—were written at his dictation a few days before he died:—

From first to last I was myself alone,
No servile follower of convention's school;
Methinks some seeds not barren I have sown.
I was no sophist's dupe, no party's tool.

HANDS OF HEALING. By Theodora Flower Mills. Bristol: J. W. Arrow-smith, Ltd. 6s.

THE author of this unambitious but pleasantly written story protests that she wrote it before reading any of the numerous "garden books" that have appeared, and that those parts of it which deal with outdoor life were suggested entirely by her own experience. We can well believe it. No one could discourse so happily and sympathetically on the joys of digging, and planting, and weeding, taking note as the days and months pass of every change in the face of Nature, and giving thanks for each newly opened flower in the wilderness her hand has tamed, without a very intimate knowledge of the processes she describes. Like many another, her heroine has sought relief from sorrow and disillusionment in a humble cottage amid the silence of the hills, and it is quite in keeping with the beneficent purposes of life that, as she tends her little garden, giving to it the care and affection she has ceased to lavish on unregenerate human beings, hope and love should find their way to her heart once more. The story which Mrs. Mills has woven round the person of Leone Yale is not very exciting, and has the air of having been invented to give an excuse for voluminous entries in an endless diary, and the self-immolation on the altar of the rural deities which is the motif throughout. Of course, there is a local Squire, with the grave face and taciturn disposition which for some unexplained reason are always popular with lady novelists, and, of course, Leone plays the 'Moonlight Sonata' to him very prettily, and makes tea in the firelight, with the usual results. But he is never a very real person, and she herself is most convincing as the sturdy little gardener in her workmanlike brown suit, who talks of tools and implements as if they were toys, and sees a parable in the delicious sprouting of some withered bulbs thrown on a rubbish heap or the entanglement of a delicate baby-fern in a coarse grass root. After all, the garden's the thing, and it was within its borders that the real drama was enacted when the flutes of Pan were calling.

WE have received from Messrs. George Philip & Son a strategical War Map of Europe, central and eastern area (price, 2s. 6d. net; or, mounted and varnished for hanging, 6s. net). The map, which is admirably clear, is on the scale of 18 miles to the inch, and will be of great help in following the Russian campaign against Germany in towns and districts which are little known in this country. The map is provided with a separate Index containing 6,500 names.

THE STORY OF GARIBALDI.

II.

[The first of this series of articles appeared last week under the title 'The Schooling of a Hero,' and covered the period of Garibaldi's boyhood and early experiences in South America. Subsequent articles will deal with the later episodes in his struggle for Italian freedom.]

WHEN Garibaldi and his Legionaries entered Rome to defend the new republic, at the head of which was Mazzini, they presented a strange appearance. The hardened, sunburnt warriors had long unkempt hair and wore conical hats with black, waving ostrich feathers. Their gaunt faces, framed with shaggy beards, were dust-soiled with the march, their legs bare. At their head rode (like a statue of strength and beauty) their noble chief on his white horse, and at his heels the gigantic negro Aguyar, his self-elected "bodyguard," on a black charger. "He has come! he has come!" the people shouted, and felt that the hour of great deeds had struck and of the resurrection of Italy from the ashes.

At first the Garibaldians carried everything before them. They dispersed the Neapolitan force advancing against the city, and defeating the French troops captured many of them. Nevertheless, the defence of Rome was foredoomed to failure before the overwhelming forces of Oudinot, the French general who had come to restore the Pope. That made no difference to the valour and enthusiasm of Garibaldi. "One hour of our life in Rome is worth a century of common existence," he declared in the midst of the struggle, for he was fighting as ever against all odds for the liberty of the people. Rome fell, and Garibaldi, refusing to surrender, called on all who were of like mind to follow him. A vast crowd had gathered on the pavement before the dome of St. Peter's to meet their champion, and when he was seen on horseback pressing slowly into their midst a tempest of cheers arose. The General held up his hand, and the multitude was still. Then his thrilling voice was heard over the sea of faces as he said: "I am going out from Rome. Let those who wish to continue the war against the stranger come with me. I offer neither pay, nor quarters, nor provisions; I offer hunger, thirst, forced marches, battles, and death. Let him who loves his country in his heart, and not with his lips only, follow me." That night, after dark, he rode out of the south gate of Rome at the head of 4,000 men, a train of waggons, and one little cannon. The besiegers were entering the city on the north. Thus began one of the most memorable retreats in history, which will be remembered forever along with the retreat of the Ten Thousand Greeks under Xenophon, the retreat of Wellington before the French through Portugal, and the retreat of the Allies from Belgium to the Marne in this present war. All, in their several ways, victorious retreats. Now that he could no longer fight for Rome Garibaldi would go and help Venice, which was besieged by the Austrians; and on the way he hoped to rouse the Italian people to spring to arms against the foreigners. In both respects he failed utterly, yet was his failure a glorious triumph of self-sacrifice and valour which bore fruit another day. "Fortune, who betrays us to-day, will smile on us to-morrow," he had said to the Romans. So it proved. The column that marched silently out of the city in the darkness had many a hero in its ranks. Foremost the brave Anita, Garibaldi's wife, who would not listen even to her husband's appeal to remain behind in safety. Ever at his leader's side was the saintly and great-hearted priest Ugo Bassi, who, though bearing no arms, had donned the red shirt which exposed its wearer to the risk of being hunted to death like a wild beast. But "Nothing would give me greater joy than to die for Garibaldi," said he, and this joy he won. During the flight he was composing a religious poem.

The faithful negro giant had fallen in the defence of Rome, but one of the doughtiest warriors, who joined the column on the march, was Hugh Forbes, "the eccentric Briton," known by the white chimney-pot hat he wore even in battle, but a knight-errant in soul, who fought wherever freedom bled, for Italians, for Poles, and for the negroes in America. There was the brave Swiss Hoffstetter, inspired by his love for Garibaldi to follow him through peril, and who lived to become the historian of the retreat. There, too, was the patriotic Roman orator Ciceruacchio, "a loveable, hearty, simple-minded man," who a month later was taken by the Austrians and shot, his youngest son, a boy of 13, standing fearlessly at his father's side and sharing his fate. Outwitting his pursuers at the start, Garibaldi led his force up into the Apennines. Thenceforward they raced over towering ridges and climbed by impossible tracks through gorge and forest so as to escape the relentless battalions who were out to hunt the lion. The waggons were forsaken. Meanwhile the intrepid horsemen trained on the Pampas were scouting far in advance and circulating reports to mislead the enemy. Sometimes the column crept forward by night, and rested, hidden by day in a shady wooded valley. There they slew and roasted oxen, while the staff gathered round their chief listening to the thrilling stories he told of his own and of Anita's adventures in South America. H. M. L.

THE CENTENARY OF PEACE WITH AMERICA.

SUNDAY SCHOOL CELEBRATION.

THE following correspondence between the Sunday School Association, London, and the President of the American Unitarian Sunday School Society has been sent to us for publication.

Essex Hall, Essex Street, Strand, London, W.C.
December 18, 1914.

DEAR MR. LAWRENCE,

We are writing to you, the President of the Unitarian Sunday School Society, to offer the Centenary Peace congratulations of the Sunday School Association, from the Sunday Schools of the United Kingdom and Colonies to those of the United States. It is an episode in modern history that well deserves to be most sincerely commemorated, all the more so when we here are living beneath a war cloud the dire consequences of which we cannot yet foresee. Thoughtful scholars may well ask their teachers here and with you, how is it the Christianity which we teach and for which we stand has not helped to find a way out of disagreement except by disastrous war? Teachers will have difficulty to find a satisfactory reply. Two years ago a most important meeting was held in London presided over by the Lord Mayor, and attended by representatives of the United States, Mr. Asquith, Mr. Balfour, the Archbishops and Presidents of the Religious Societies. It was called together to give voice to a unanimous desire to fittingly commemorate the 100 years of peace between the two countries. We were reminded that the United States and Canadian frontiers extended many thousands of miles, and that there was no fortified town or fortress along the whole line. We trust that our long peace, a blessing to the whole world, may continue indefinitely, and that the commemoration now being celebrated may still further strengthen the good feeling and friendship existing between the two countries.

With kind regards,

Yours sincerely,

ION PRITCHARD,

President.

T. M. CHALMERS,

Hon. Sec.

To this letter the following reply has been received:—

Unitarian Sunday School Society,

25, Beacon Street, Boston,

January 8, 1915.

DEAR MR. PRITCHARD,

Your very courteous letter, extending the felicitations of the Unitarian Sunday Schools of the United Kingdom and the Colonies to those of this country, was duly received, and was read before the Board of Directors of the Unitarian Sunday School Society at their regular monthly meeting on January 4. The Board received the communication with a vote of thanks, and instructed me to reply, conveying to you, and through you to the Sunday School Association and the schools you represent, the fraternal greetings of your fellow-workers on this side the Atlantic. It was also voted that copies of your letter and of this reply should be sent to all Unitarian Sunday Schools in the United States and Canada, with the suggestion that they be read to those schools on Sunday, February 14.

With these letters there will be sent to all our schools a specially prepared service to be used on that date, celebrating the completion of 100 years of peace between Great Britain and the United States. That celebration means much to us, especially as we have a British province bordering our country for 3,000 miles. In almost any other part of the world this proximity of two countries would signify possible hostilities and the need of constant military precautions. In this case, however, as you state, no such possibility of strife between the United States and Canada is apprehended. Where else can one find, in all the world, a bordering line without so much as a sentry standing guard? If mutual confidence is better than suspicion and international jealousies, and if guarded frontiers are not necessary between the United States and Canada, why is not the same true everywhere? It seems to be one of the peculiar missions of the American continent to point the way to universal disarmament and the reign of peace and goodwill.

All this brings a special responsibility to our Sunday Schools. Peace societies are numerous among us, but it seems not to have been fully realised that the best peace society in all the world is the Sunday School. On this continent alone there are many millions of children and young people gathered in Sunday Schools, with whom meet other millions of men and women, all in the attitude of learners and all animated by the religion of the Prince of Peace. That these schools, of all denominations, are to celebrate the centennial of the Ghent Treaty on the same day—February 14, 1915—using for the most part the same service, means much for the future of the gospel of peace and goodwill. Words will be spoken, great passages from the world's wisdom will be memorised, and prayers will be offered on that day that will impress young hearts with the horror and stupidity of war and the glory of human brotherhood.

Finally, let me express the hope that this exchange of fraternal greetings and this reminder of our mutual blessings and responsibilities will bring the Unitarian Sunday Schools of our two English-speaking countries into closer touch with each other. With one language, one faith, one religious inheritance, and one spiritual outlook we should join hands whenever we can in our common task of promoting the religion of love to God and love to man. Yours very truly,

(Sgd.) WILLIAM J. LAWRENCE,

President.

MESSAGE FROM THE AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

IN response to the Address from the President and the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association to the President and the Directors of the American Unitarian Association, the following reply has been received from the Rev. Samuel A. Eliot, D.D., signed also by the Rev. Lewis G. Wilson (Secretary) and the Rev. C. W. Wendte, D.D. (Foreign Secretary).

Arrangements are being made for a Special Religious Service in commemoration of the Centenary of Peace in all the American Unitarian Churches on Sunday, February 14. A copy of the Address from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and of the Reply from the American Unitarian Association, Dr. Eliot says, will be forwarded to the minister of each congregation.

[COPY OF REPLY.]

25, Beacon Street, Boston,

Mass, U.S.A.

January 12, 1915.

DEAR BRETHREN,—Your affectionate greetings, reminding us of the peaceful and friendly relations which for a century have existed between Great Britain and the United States of America, bring us good cheer.

May the underlying unity between these two great nations, bound together as they are by a common language and literature, honouring the same traditions, and pursuing the same ideals of political and social well-being, never be disturbed by the cruel and barbarous fanaticism of war. May the religious hopes and impulses that we cherish, whose fundamental purpose is to promote freedom, justice, and peace among the children of God, help to establish on this earth the reign of Brotherhood and Goodwill.

On this Anniversary, therefore, even while the clouds of strife and bloodshed in Europe overshadow our American homes and hearts, we yet rejoice with you that so many noble men and women of our faith have seen, and are labouring to make real and final, the prophetic vision in which "nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more."

We pledge our patient and disinterested endeavours to preserve and deepen the fraternal relations now existing between these two great nations, and we join with you in the prayer that mankind everywhere may receive the spirit and obtain the blessings of universal peace.

(Signed) SAMUEL A. ELIOT, President.

LEWIS G. WILSON, Secretary.

CHARLES W. WENDTE,

Foreign Secretary.

BRAHMO SAMAJ ANNIVERSARY.

ON Sunday, January 24, a meeting of the members of the London Brahmo Samaj was held at Lindsey Hall, Kensington, to celebrate the eighty-fourth anniversary of the founding of the Brahmo Samaj of India. There was a large attendance of Indians, including several ladies in Oriental costumes. Beyond the Secretary of the Unitarian Association, there were very few London Unitarians present, owing probably to no public notice of the gathering having appeared. Sir Krishna Gupta presided. He welcomed all who had assembled to commemorate the founding of an important and far-reaching religious movement in India, whose history and ideals he sketched in broad outline. The Rev. Dr. Walsh delivered an address on the divine Fatherhood and the human Brotherhood. The devastating war now waging over so large a part of the world was a deplorable commentary on the principles and faith of religious people in all lands. He could only hope that it would arouse in men, not merely a sense of failure and of shame, but also quicken within them a firm and strenuous resolve so to think and feel and live that the world might be saved from a repetition of such madness and wickedness in the future.

Bengali music, consisting of Indian chants and hymns, preceded and followed the address.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE UNION FOR SOCIAL SERVICE.

At a meeting of the Executive Committee of the National Conference Union for Social Service, held at Birmingham on Saturday, January 23, the following resolution was passed unanimously:—

"That a strong and emphatic appeal be made to the Committee of the National Conference to reconsider their decision to postpone the Triennial Meeting. In the opinion of the Committee, the Conference should undoubtedly be held, even if in a modified form, and one day at least should be set apart for the discussion, from the Christian point of view, of fundamental considerations raised by the War."

We may again call attention here to the course for Study Circles, &c., on "European International Polity, with special reference to the origins and issues of the present War and to the fundamental religious principles involved in securing a just and lasting peace." Copies may be obtained, 1d. post free, from the Rev. H. H. Johnson, Secretary, National Conference Union for Social Service, Croft Road, Evesham.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Accrington.—On Saturday last, Mr. Alfred Webster presided over the Annual Congregational Meeting. Speeches were delivered by the Chairman, Rev. J. Hinkins, and Mr. J. R. Cameron. The reports of the Church and Sunday School for the past year were read, and the balance sheet submitted. Although the past year has been rather a trying one, and the financial position shows a considerable deficit, there was a hopeful tone, and already steps are being taken to wipe out the debt. The highest appreciation was expressed for the work of the minister.

Huddersfield.—The Rev. R. A. Dickson of Bourne End, Bucks (Congregationalist), has accepted an invitation to the pulpit of the Fitzwilliam Street Church, and will take up his duties early next month.

Ilford.—The annual meeting of members was held in the schoolroom on Friday. There was a good attendance. Reports were read from the Church Committee and the Treasurer, showing that the year which seemed likely at one time to end with a serious deficit, owing to the losses through the War, and to the exertions put forward in aid of the Red Cross Society and the relief of Belgian refugees, had ended with a balance in hand of over £7. This was due largely to a special grant made by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, which inspired the congregation to work for the clearing off of the deficit by means of a local sale of work organised by the Sewing Circle and the Women's League. Reports were also read from the Secretaries of the Literary Society, Mothers' Meeting, Sunday School, Boys' Own Brigade, Girls' Own Brigade, League of Unitarian Women, Band of Hope, Young People's Guild, Church Orchestra, Choral Society, and the book table. General progress was reported, and it was stated that the Sunday School had shown a substantial increase, now numbering ninety children, and had almost reached the limit of accommodation provided in the building. Mr. A. H. Laws resigned the position of Church Secretary, which he has held for the past four years, and was accorded a cordial vote of thanks for his faithful services. Mr. Charles Syer, of 52, Richmond Road, Ilford, was elected in his place. Mr. E. R. Fyson was re-elected Chairman of the Church; and Mr. Arthur Beecroft, Hon. Treasurer. Messrs. J. G. Foster and J. Ellerton were re-elected Wardens, and Messrs. W. Russell and H. Huntley, Auditors. The Committee for the year was also elected, several extra names being added. The minister, the Rev. A. H. Biggs, gave an encouraging address, and the meeting ended with the Benediction.

Ipswich.—Mr. W. J. Scopes has, on account of ill-health, lately resigned the office of Warden at the Unitarian Church, Friars Street. He has been connected all his life with the Unitarian cause, and for more than fifty years has taken an active part in the affairs of the Church. The excellent state of preservation of the fine old chapel is largely due to his assiduous care. The congregation have presented Mr. Scopes with an illuminated address as a mark of their appreciation and their gratitude.

Liberal Christian League.—Under the auspices of the Liberal Christian League a meeting will be held at London College, 409, Holloway Road, on Thursday, February 4, at 8 P.M., when Andrew MacLaren, Esq. (of the Union of Democratic Control), will speak on 'The Terms of Peace the People Need.' The public are invited.

Northampton.—After fulfilling an engagement with the Northampton Men's Own in Doddridge (Congregational) Church in the afternoon, Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., preached at Kettering Road Church last Sunday evening, his subject being 'The Unity of Man.' The members of the congregation are meeting demands made upon them by the War chiefly through a War Benevolent Fund, to which most of them and the young people of our Institute are making weekly contributions. Most of the money already collected has been forwarded to the Commission for Relief in Belgium. The Literary and Social Union, which up to the present has been unable to hold meetings by reason of the occupation of the schoolroom by troops, will open its winter session on February 5. An exceptionally good programme of literary lectures and papers has been arranged. The minister, the Rev. W. C. Hall, is delivering courses of morning and evening sermons on 'Unitarianism and its New Constructions Necessitated by Biblical Research and Present-Day Problems of Religious Thought,' and 'The Christianity of the Sermon on the Mount and its Application to the Age.'

Nottingham.—An interesting little ceremony took place at the Annual Soirée of the High Pavement congregation on January 21, when Mr. J. C. Warren was presented with his portrait, a silver cup, and an illuminated address from the members of the congregation and Sunday School. Mr. Warren has been for over thirty years connected with the High Pavement congregation and Sunday School, to which he has always devoted his untiring energy and kindness. The presentation was made by Mr. Benjamin Dowson, one of his earliest friends and one of the oldest members of the congregation; and the meeting was also addressed by Mr. J. E. Perry, the Rev. J. C. Ballantyne, and others, who all bore warm testimony to the affection and esteem felt for Mr. and Mrs. Warren, by each and all of their numerous friends.

Walthamstow.—On Monday, January 25, the Drummond Lodge of Young Christian Citizens gave their first Annual Display at the Unitarian Church, Truro Road. The opening service was conducted entirely by the children, and an address was given by Col. John Lee, J.P., of the City Temple, during the evening. The Superintendent of the Martineau Lodge brought a deputation from Forest Gate, and hearty greetings were sent by the newly-formed Lindsey Lodge, Stratford.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

THE FRIENDS' AMBULANCE UNIT.

Mr. Geoffrey Winthrop Young, the war correspondent, who is also the author of a delightful volume of poems, has been contributing some interesting articles to The Friend on the work of the Friends' Ambulance Unit, of which he is one of the principal officers. The headquarters are at Dunkirk, and from there the various activities of the staff, who are running hospitals and organising the distribution of food and clothing to destitute Belgians at various points, are directed. It seems as if there is nothing they cannot turn their hands to, from tending the wounded and feeding the hungry—sometimes soldiers suffering from ague and frost-bite, sometimes the miserable inhabitants of ruined towns and villages—to arranging the details of postal transfer and playing the harmonium in a hastily contrived chapel, with the incessant rattle of rifle-fire from the trenches making a sinister accompaniment. The cheerfulness of doctors, orderlies, and nurses alike under the most trying circumstances is often referred to, and their immunity from sickness or injury, though constantly under fire, recorded with thankfulness. "Again to-day," says Mr. Young, in his matter-of-fact way, "I left a busy party sweeping out the glass and litter of our last bombardment from their prospective bedroom, and planking up the broken windows in cheerful humour, to carry in a pretty little girl of 7, with gold hair and an unconquerable smile, in spite of an arm broken and twice pierced by shrapnel. . . . Her mother and grandmother were killed this morning by the same shell that wounded her."

NEW TRADES FOR OLD MEN.

A scheme which has been inaugurated for teaching mature men, mostly over forty years of age, a new trade opens up interesting possibilities. As described by the Warden of Toynbee Hall in The Times, this original social experiment has been set on foot for the purpose of making up the deficiency of skilled workers in the leather industry during a period of unprecedented activity. Manufacturers have been unable to get enough leather stitchers for the military accoutrement work, for not only have the demands of the British Army to be satisfied, but millions of pounds-worth of leather goods are needed for the French and Russian Governments. An ideal opening has thus presented itself for the transference of labour from such trades as are now depressed—cabinet-making, upholstery, &c.—to a trade which is abnormally brisk, and the only difficulty was to train the men. Financial help was obtained, however, from the Prince of Wales's Fund, and on December 7th a school for the purpose was opened at Toynbee Hall, which had offered rent free a large building for the purpose. It was a venture of faith, and many doubts were expressed as to the possibility of grown-up men being able to learn a new trade readily, but the experiment has been a real success. Up to January 15th the number enrolled was 139, 64 of whom have been found employment in leather stitching. Every man who has had a full month's training has found work, and only two were sent away because of their inability to learn. The keenness of the men is extraordinary, and any reluctance to go into a strange workshop and start learning like a boy is overcome by the fact that all are about the same age, and that the teachers are thoroughly interested in them. A fresh grant has been given to enable the school to be continued for another month.

DIVIDED LOYALTIES IN AMERICA.

Dr. Wendte makes a moving appeal in The Christian Register for those European-Americans who are finding it very hard at present to be true to their instinctive affections for their race and kindred, and at the same time to remain loyal to the new obligations imposed upon them as citizens in the United States. "This struggle becomes more complex and harder," he says, speaking of those of German descent, "when, as is more often the case than we imagine, their hearts draw them to espouse the cause of their Fatherland, while their larger information and their dispassionate judgment convince them that that cause is not always to be endorsed or defended, or even that its unqualified victory would be a victory of monarchical and aristocratic institutions, of military prestige and national arrogance, which would work harm rather than good to the world. Yet they dare not avow these opinions to their foreign relatives and friends, who are in no mood, in their present desperate struggle, to listen to doubts or criticisms. Such an attempt would only alienate them for ever from their kindred and the country of their birth. Believe me, to undergo this inner conflict between the emotions of the heart and the disclosures of reason and conscience is one of the severest, bitterest trials a human heart can know, and many there are of foreign birth or descent in our country who experience it." Dr. Wendte pleads with Americans to cherish a considerate spirit towards all whose allegiance is thus divided, to appreciate their mental and moral struggles, and make every allowance for their display of racial, national, and personal feeling.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

OUR Belgian Hospital Fund continues to make good progress. The considerable sum of money and the bountiful supplies of clothing which have been collected without any private appeal show how deeply the need is realised, and how eager people are to help in a special department of work where there can be concentration of effort and confidence that relief is quick and effective. The deeply interesting letter from Mrs Allen, which we print to-day, is written in the quiet confidence that we are not going to relax our efforts. It is also an assurance that the simple machinery which we have been able to organise is capable of distributing any amount of help, which may be entrusted to our care, with speed and efficiency.

Is there no rich man who will make himself happy by sending us £1,000? It will all be spent on the relief of the suffering of these splendid Belgian soldiers, and in sending them back to the trenches in good health and warmly clad when they have recovered from sickness and wounds. Are there no poor people, scholars in our Sunday Schools, happy children in our homes who will give us shillings and pence? We have just heard of a number of women clerks in a London office who have clubbed together to send 30s. to the Fund. Who will follow their example? We have one other suggestion to make to those who want to be generous. Mrs. Allen will be glad to receive promises of weekly or monthly contributions. The need will go on, and as long as the need exists there is a claim upon us for steady help.

* * *

THE re-assembling of the House of Commons this week is very welcome, because it will provide the channel which we need for information and discussion. There will be no attempt to pass contentious legislation. In the circumstances this is entirely right, though it may cause a good deal of disappointment in some quarters, and the regretful feeling that many needed measures of reform are postponed indefinitely. In consequence there should be a good deal of softening in the bitterness of party feeling, and a fine opportunity for that best kind of criticism which does not aim at the defeat of an opponent, but at the real improvement of the machinery of government. The Manchester Guardian makes the interesting suggestion that this truce in party hostilities might be used in order to press forward many of the unopposed measures which are sacrificed every session to the inexorable demands of a crowded official programme.

In the abnormal circumstances created by the war much might be said in favour of a coalition Government. We are glad, however, that this expedient has not been adopted. Apart from the fact that a coalition is usually regarded as a measure of emergency, in order to revive confidence and frustrate incipient decay, there is grave danger to the State when there is no effective criticism in the House of Commons. At the present moment the Opposition can perform its patriotic duty best by acting the part of the watchful and generous critic. There should be no sign of the petty and capitious temper, which has a keen scent for abuses where none exist worthy the attention of any intelligent mind; but able men who are devoted to their work, and are eager that it should be done as well as possible with a single eye to the national welfare, will be the first to welcome the spur to efficiency which is supplied by a group of critical observers who will always exact a very high standard of excellence before they are satisfied.

It is good news for most of us that an early day will be given for the discussion of the rapid rise in the cost of living. We are all willing to bear the necessary burdens of the war with a cheerful courage. An international convulsion must interfere with the orderly ways of commerce, and send up prices to some extent by limiting our available supplies. But we want to be assured that no one is taking a mean advantage of us, or turning the war to his own profit regardless of the sufferings of the poor. It is also possible that the Government interference with the means of transit by sea and land, which has been absolutely necessary for military purposes, may be open to some improvement in business methods which will be to the advantage of the civilian population. The whole situation needs to be explored in the light of the best expert knowledge, so that there may be as little privation as possible among those who are least able to bear it.

THERE has been some public impatience over the delay of the report of the Select Committee appointed to consider the scale of allowances and pensions for men in the army and navy. Now that it has been issued, it will be seen what an immense amount of labour has been involved. The new scale shows a marked increase all round. It does not go so far as the proposals of the Labour Party, but it is by far the most generous provision which has ever been attempted by any country. The rate for total disablement is raised to 25s. weekly; while the pension for a widow without children is to vary from 10s. to a maximum of 15s. at the age of 45. One of the most important recommendations in the report is a new definition of "Dependents." It is in the following terms:—"When more than one person is dependent upon one man the maximum allowance may be increased to the amount which would have been payable if the first dependent had been a wife and the others had been children. The term 'dependents' should include any person who is found as a fact to have been dependent on the sailor or soldier."

THERE are growing signs that Germany is beginning to feel the pinch of war. Berlin has been placed on bread rations controlled by the Government. No doubt this is simply a measure of precaution, but it is a sign of the inevitable end, unless she can reverse the present situation and "hack her way through," and gain control of the sea. Fortunately, this is one of the things which may be described as highly improbable. The stoppage of her supplies will cause a great deal of misery among innocent people, and at this no humane man can rejoice. But it seems the most likely method of damping down war fever and bringing the mass of the population to a more sober mind and a desire for peace. For this reason it is impossible not to feel some sense of stern satisfaction at every item of news of this kind which is allowed to leak out.

THE German Socialist newspaper Vorwärts has shown great cleverness in evading the censorship and guarding for itself some of the rights of independent criticism. It supports the war, but it does so in a dignified way, and evidently feels deeply the degradation of the wild ravings of international hatred. In a recent number it comments upon the action of a teacher in an elementary school in Berlin, who teaches his children to recite Lissauer's 'Hymn of Hate,' in the following terms:—

We believe we are acting in the interests of our youth, and, consequently, of our country, if we draw attention to this conduct of a teacher and educationist. Is there, in this serious time, really no other feeling which one could arouse in children, and no other thought at hand than that of hatred? Would not the thought of the spirit of sacrifice of their fellow-citizens who are fighting at the front, of their fathers and brothers who are staking their lives for our sake—would not this thought really suffice to occupy the minds of German children?

THE Dutch Reformed Church of South Africa has adopted a wise and conciliatory attitude in face of the internal difficulties created for it by the rebellion. At a Conference held recently at Bloemfontein it concentrated its attention upon efforts to re-establish unity among the Dutch people, which has been so rudely broken. To this end it appealed for a spirit of patriotism and toleration from all parties, and pointed out the need of patient inquiry into the true motives and intentions of the recent opposition, and especially into the real or supposed grievances which occasioned it. The Conference further recommended the suspension of judgment of ministers who had participated in the rebellion pending full information, thereby following the precedent accepted in the Boer War. It was resolved that the Council should petition the Government not to execute the sentence of death on any one on account of participation in the recent rebellion.

M. ROMAIN ROLLAND has published another noble article in the Journal de Genève, which has been reissued in an English translation by The Cambridge Magazine. It is a plea for the pitiable case of the civilian prisoners. "They are," he points out, "one of the innovations of this unbridled war, which seems to have set itself to violate all the rights of humanity. In former wars it was only a question of a few hostages arrested here and there as a guarantee of good faith for the pledge of some conquered town. Never until now had one heard of populations taken bodily into captivity on the model of ancient conquests—a custom actively revived since the beginning of this war."

M. ROLLAND has no practical plan of succour for these people, who have been torn from their homes and separated from those whom they love; but he feels that men like himself, who write, can do something to provide medicines for the soul, and to dress the wounds of hatred and vengeance by which the world is being possessed.

Look at the ruins around us! [he says] We may bring aid to the victims—yet how little can we achieve! In the eternal struggle between good and evil the scales are not evenly balanced. We need a century to recreate what one day can destroy. The fury of madness endures only for a day; patient labour is our lot throughout the years. It knows no pause, even in those hours when the world seems at an end. The vine-growers of Champagne gather in their vintage though the bombs of the rival armies explode around them—and we, too, can do our share! There is work for all who find themselves outside the battle. Especially for those who still can write, it seems to me that there should be something better to do than to brandish a pen dipped in blood and seated at their tables to cry "Kill! Kill!" I hate the war, but even more do I hate those who glorify it without taking part. What would we say of officers who marched behind their men? The noblest rôle of those who follow in the rear is to pick up their friends who fall, and to bear in mind, even during the battle, those fair words so often forgotten—Inter Arma Caritas.

THE article on the Free Churches in The Manchester Guardian last week was devoted to an appreciative account of Mr. McLachlan's History of the Unitarian Home Missionary College. In one or two points it betrays such an extraordinary ignorance of the facts that it is impossible for us to pass it over in silence. The statement that "it was the divinity teaching given at that time at the Owens College which frightened Manchester New College away from Manchester to London in 1853" is quite ludicrous. The College was removed chiefly on account of the better education provided for the undergraduate students at University College, and was not "frightened away" at all. Still more amazing is the statement that Dr. Martineau frankly ranged himself with the opposition to the movement for establishing domestic missions. As a matter of fact it had no more earnest supporter. Over and over again to the last years of his active life he employed his lofty eloquence in pleading their cause. No doubt he held that a poor education is not in itself a qualification for preaching to the poor, but many of the wisest doctors and greatest saints of the Church have agreed with him in that opinion.

THE REMEDY OF FORCE.

"FORCE is no remedy" is repeated as an aphorism by many sensible people. Nay more, it is held as a dogma by some of them with the tenacity which often takes the place of thought. They are inclined to regard all who do not accept it as either foolish or wicked. For them non-resistance, the total inhibition of the use of force, is an essential article of the creed, without which we forfeit all right to profess or call ourselves Christians. We confess that these attempts to make one or two sayings the measure of the meaning of the Gospel always arouse our suspicion. We want to ask questions. We are inclined to pause for a moment or two in order to analyse the meaning of words. Above all, we are tempted to inquire whether the people who challenge us in this way make a serious attempt to put precept into practice on ordinary occasions in their own home and neighbourhood, renouncing for themselves and their families every kind of protection which involves resistance to the evil-doer; or do they reserve it for the great occasions when international relationships are disturbed, and the voice of the private citizen, plead he never so eloquently, can do nothing to stop the onset of armies, or to strike the weapons from the hands of those who fight? If the precept "Force is no remedy" is to be used sincerely in order to condemn all wars as criminal, from whatever motive they may be undertaken, it can only be by men who have made an earnest effort to renounce every covenant with force in their private affairs. Such men exist, but they are very few.

But clearly the word "Force" has about it here some subtle tincture of evil. It is a symbol for the will which exercises it, or the human motive which guides it; and it is assumed that these are degraded or malevolent. "Force" is thus the expression of the will which injures and destroys, and never, in this connection, of the will which loves. It conjures up before the imagination harsh images of hatred or ruthless ambition. It is an instrument of violence which we seize in moments of impatience or indignation, because we have little confidence in the value of charity and lovingkindness. We must all admit that a great deal of Force is precisely of this kind. So far from being a remedy for human ills, it aggravates the base and unworthy passions which drive us into enmity. We cannot watch against our own temptations to use it in this way too carefully. If we are wise we shall remember that in fighting for our own cause and advantage we are often blind. Our hearts may be heavy and bitter with malice and vindictiveness, even when we are contending for the right. And yet, though it is terribly hard to use Force righteously, it can be done. The will behind it may be loving and holy, and in thwarting the designs of the wicked man and bringing them down to the ground, it may be bent simply upon the redemption of the world from wrong and the healing of its wounds.

We agree, again, that it is true to say that Force is no remedy in the sense that efforts merely to curb or destroy evil, no matter how strong and noble they appear, can create nothing. However necessary resistance may be, it is simply negative from the point of view of high spiritual purpose. To oppose sin is a very different thing from creating goodness, and it is the second not the first which must always be our chief end. Christianity can only thrive on positive virtues, and it must always have a certain distaste for anything but its highest work. Its joy is in the creation of good, though it will not fail us in the grim tasks which are imposed by the evil of the world. Many of our social disasters are due to our forgetfulness of this elementary truth. It has seemed enough to restrain, to adopt measures of prevention, when we ought to be putting forth all our strength to extend the kingdom of love, with the result that our penal system is still a very poor instrument of righteousness, and conflicts which might be the beginning of a better understanding only result in a deeper enmity. It is in these directions that the Christian conscience must be trained into a finer sensitiveness, that it may not be clouded by the high and generous passion of a moment like the present, or seduced into satisfaction with victories, which are lower than the hard-won victories of love.

But having said all this we want to point out that in this world as God has made it, and as we know it, Force is a real remedy, and the only one which we have at command for certain limited ends. Whether it is a remedy or not depends upon the object for which it is used. If the object is to convert a sinner from his ways, and to plant the love of God in his heart, then it is no remedy at all. But if the one thing which commands all our attention at the moment is the warding off of imminent danger, or the protection of threatened innocence, then force may be the only method which it is open to us to use, as a man builds a dyke to protect his cultivated land from the devouring sea. Is not this a high and legitimate exercise of human power which, over and over again, has been crowned with success? Will any one say that we forfeit our claim to be the disciples of Jesus Christ because we defend the weak and the innocent from outrage and death, or organise resistance to barbarian hordes which threaten to trample all the garnered wealth of the Spirit in the dust? We know that a few people do accept this extreme position. We can only say that we are in deepest disagreement with them. In their devotion to doctrinaire opinions they seem to us to do violence, not only to the facts of history, but also to the deepest facts of conscience. There is here no question of vindictiveness, an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth; nor does protective action of this kind conflict in any way with the doctrine of the cross. To accept sacrificial suffering for ourselves as the highest expression of love is a very different thing from meekly submitting to outrage upon other people or to the destruction of the national life of which we form a part. If Christianity involves, as we are sometimes told, the total abandonment of the use of Force for purposes of protection, and we can be good and holy on no other terms, then the future of religion must lie in the cloister, where a few people will be guarded in the practice of unworldly virtue by the masses of men who struggle and suffer outside. We cannot agree that there is either common sense or spiritual wisdom in a theory which, when it is pressed home, amounts to this, that ruffians must be left to do exactly what they like.

To many of our readers what we have written this week must appear quite unnecessary; but we have come across some unquiet consciences to whom we should like to speak a reassuring word. Christianity is not a series of moral dogmas which can be applied almost without thought to every duty as it confronts us. It is a spirit of life, the spirit of life in Christ Jesus, which enters into alliance alike with our most intimate personal experience and with the mighty forces and struggles of human history. It does not cast men off as apostates, when, at the bar of conscience, they feel bound to accept a policy of resistance to fraud, dishonour, or aggression. It teaches them how to use Force, that most dangerous weapon in violent and relentless hands, with such steadiness of purpose and magnanimity of temper that in the end it too may turn to the glory of God.

Good Thoughts for Ebil Times.

THE NATURE OF GOD.

WHAT is God? Length, breadth, height, and depth.

Length, I say. What is that? Eternity. This is so long that it hath no end, not more in place than in time.

He is also breadth. And what is that? Love. With what bounds is love hemmed in in God, who hateth nothing that He hath made? For He maketh the sun to shine upon the good and the evil, and sendeth rain over the just and the unjust. Therefore his bosom embraceth also His enemies. And not even content with this, Divine Love spreadeth out into infinity. It exceedeth not only affection, but knowledge also, for the Apostle aspireth "to know the love of Christ which transcendeth knowledge."

What, again, is God? Height and depth. In the one He is above all things; in the other He is below all things. Consider His power—its height, His wisdom—its depth. His height—His sublimity—is far beyond reach. His depth—His profoundness—is inscrutable. Paul, in accents of wonder, saith: "O the depth of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are His judgments, and His ways how past finding out!" We, too, contemplating power and wisdom in God, and their perfect unity with God, may exclaim: "O powerful wisdom, reaching everywhere mightily! O wise power, planning all things sweetly!"

ST. BERNARD.

THE KINGLY GUEST.

YET if His Majesty, our sovereign lord, Should of his own accord Friendly himself invite, And say, "I'll be your guest to-morrow night,"

How should we stir ourselves, call and command

All hands to work! "Let no man idle stand.

Set me fine Spanish tables in the hall,

See they be fitted all;

Let there be room to eat,

And order taken that there want no meat, See every sconce and candlestick made bright,

That without tapers they may give a light.

Look to the presence: are the carpets spread,

The dais o'er the head,

The cushions in the chairs,

And all the candles lighted on the stairs?

Perfume the chambers, and in any case Let each man give attendance in his place."

Thus if the King were coming would we do,

And 'twere good reason too;

For 'tis a duteous thing

To show all honour to an earthly king.

And after all our travail and our cost,

So he be pleased, to think no labour lost.

But at the coming of the King of Heaven All's set at six and seven:

We wallow in our sin,

Christ cannot find a chamber in the inn,

We entertain Him always like a stranger,

And as at first still lodge Him in the manger.

ANON.

WARM my cold heart, Lord, I beseech

Thee. Take away all that hinders me from giving myself to Thee. Mould me according to Thine own image. Give me grace to obey Thee in all things, and ever to follow Thy gracious leading.

Make me this day to be kind to my fellow-men, to be gentle and unselfish, careful to hurt no one by word or deed, but anxious to do good to all, and to make others happy. O Lord, forgive the sins of my temper. Pardon all my hasty words and unchristian thoughts. Make me watchful, that I offend not with my tongue. Give me a meek and loving spirit, which is in Thy sight of great price. Amen.

WHAT SHALL I GIVE?

THIS is a question which ought to press heavily upon each one of us to-day—a question simple enough in form, but by no means easy to answer satisfactorily. "What shall I give?" To the urgent call for self-sacrifice which comes to every English man and woman to-day, what shall be my response? What in the Court of Conscience is my liability? There is no one who can assess it for me. The answer is a matter which lies between myself and God.

Splendid, indeed, has been the answer given by many. How many thousands of young men have answered simply and quietly: "My life, that is my gift." How many hundreds of brave women have left their comfortable homes to tend the dying and the wounded. How many people, out of their little, have given freely to succour the distressed. How many doctors and others have made great sacrifices in order to give their personal services to the great cause. Yet how many there are who have so far done little or nothing, or, setting a narrow limit to their own liability, have declared "So far, but no farther, will I go."

But it will not do. The call still comes insistent, almost threatening—instinct, too, with a solemn warning. How will it be with me when the end comes, and the victory is won, and I cannot look my fellows in the face feeling that I did my share?

It is so easy to deceive ourselves in this matter. We are apt to make our estimate of what we can spare, and limit ourselves by that. Too often we deal very tenderly with ourselves in this business of sparing. We interpret it as meaning what we can forego without feeling the difference. It is as if our soldiers, offering themselves for battle, did so upon condition that they should not be seriously wounded nor exposed to great hardships.

Surely at a time like this we ought to want to feel something of the sacrifice and pain by which alone our country can be saved. To give out of our superfluity is not enough. We need to share in the suffering, not sympathetically merely, but in some real way, if we are to share in the triumph and the great national purification which may come out of this time of trouble if it be rightly met. By many, very many, it is being rightly and splendidly met. I want to take off my hat to every khaki-clad youth and Red Cross sister that I meet. What use in that if I am not acting so that they would do the same by me?

When the end comes there will be some who will secretly, not publicly boast: "Thank God, it has cost me nothing. I have taken care of myself." Of all men they will be most to be pitied, for, having had no share in England's suffering, they will be entitled to none in the glory of her victory. They will have saved their bodies and their pockets at the expense of their souls.

As the weeks of war roll on, the call to give—money, services, life—will become ever more urgent. Sad, indeed, will be the lot of the man who, when the end comes, has to confess to himself that he has not responded as he might have done. For he will be conscious of having failed his country in her time of need, and that to himself might be applied the lines :—

He alone breaks from the van and the freeman,
He alone sinks to the rear and the slaves.

THE BELGIAN HOSPITAL FUND.

SIR,—Your readers will like to know what has been already done towards supplying the needs of the Belgian hospitals for which we appealed for help. We sent parcels of warm clothing out at once to the three hospitals of which we had personal knowledge, and we have already received letters from the doctors in charge thanking us for the gifts, and telling us what comfort they have brought to their patients. One doctor, writing this week, says: "We feel the most profound gratitude for England's generosity. The English are not only our brothers-in-arms, they are also our benefactors. England has brought us not only military and material aid, but also fraternal aid, and it is that which I consider as her greatest title to our gratitude, for, even in war, suffering is sacred." He goes on to ask for a number of hospital requisites—dressings and comforts—all of which we have sent this week. Another Belgian chief medical officer for a town near the frontier confidently asks us to send him certain things, such as shirts, socks, pants, towels, and handkerchiefs, for his 1,500 patients! We have sent a good deal towards this, but not nearly enough yet; but I think his confidence will not be misplaced!

We have been very fortunate in our arrangements for sending and distributing the goods. A kind friend who knows the hospitals well offered to take the goods out on January 22 and personally ascertain the most crying needs. He returned on Wednesday, January 27, and brought detailed lists of wants from five hospitals, two in one town, and three in another. These lists he had made up after discussing the matter with each hospital, and they revealed the fact that in several cases drugs, medical instruments, hospital utensils of various sorts—all absolutely necessary to the well-being of the patients—were lacking. He told us of hospitals where it was necessary to send round to another hospital to borrow a syringe or surgeons' knives, where the dressings had to be washed and used again, and in one case where there was no chloroform. The unnecessary suffering that this entails on the sick and wounded need not be emphasised.

In all cases warm clothing, both for men able to be up in the wards and for men ready to go out into the world again, was needed.

We decided to send the absolutely necessary drugs, instruments, and appliances without delay, and the same friend has again gone across this week, carrying with him over £100-worth of these things, and also a large consignment of warm clothing. He will also visit several other hospitals which we know need help on the same lines, and bring details of needs. It may prove possible to establish a small dépôt there to facilitate the distribution of goods, but this is not settled yet. I hope to go across again in a few weeks and see for myself the comfort we have been able to bring into the wards. As stated last week, we have sent direct to men in the trenches, in response to an urgent appeal from a Belgian commandant visiting this country, as it seemed a way of helping to keep the men from succumbing in such numbers to sickness, but our real concern here is with the hospitals, and only with those with which we are in personal touch. We want to help these devoted doctors and nurses to help their own sick and wounded, and we want to do it in the most friendly way, not to criticise or interfere in their methods, but to place in their hands the means of doing their work more efficiently, and to let them feel that our aid is indeed "fraternal."

Up to the present about £600 has been subscribed in money, and, roughly speaking, about £300-worth of goods. About £120 has been spent on chemists' things, and £220 on clothing, including boots, overcoats, blankets, towels, vests, pants, &c. Several working parties and branches of the Women's League in various parts of the country have promised to work for these hospitals. Voluntary helpers to pack up the goods have been forthcoming. Mrs. Walter Hall lent her motor-car to carry parcels down into town to be dispatched, and Miss Dorothy Moggridge has arranged to give three concerts in Hampstead, on February 13, 16, and 23, in aid of the Fund.

If we are to go on with this work (and there can be no doubt of that!), and to extend it to other hospitals, we shall need greatly increased funds and gifts in kind. We realise how generous the response has already been, but the field of work is proving to be so wide, and the need so urgent, that we appeal with confidence for still further help. May I add that the articles which we need most urgently this week are shirts, pants, vests, socks, handkerchiefs, towels, long mufflers, and pyjamas.

CHRISTIANITY AND WAR.

SIR,—I cannot but think that the words attributed to Jesus—"Resist not him that is evil" (R.V.)—mean exactly what they say. The fact is, there is such a wide gulf between our consciousness and that of Jesus, or the Christ-consciousness, that we are quite unable to look at things from his standpoint. Granted that during his life on earth he was human like ourselves, he so clothed himself with the spirit of the living God that "he overcame the world" of manifestation and sense, and became one with the great and only reality—First Cause, Being, God. Emerson says in "The Oversoul," "The simplest person, who in his integrity worships God, becomes God."

Was not this the case with Jesus, and is it not equally certain that it is not the case with the vast majority of people to-day? Is there any one to-day who can claim to have more than faint and transitory glimpses of the Eternal Being of God? And yet Jesus has shown us that it is possible for us to know God as he did, and therein is our great hope. What he did is possible for us. But we do not do it; we are hearers only, and not doers. We are saturated with race-thought and race-experience, which are faulty and materialistic, and we seek after the things of the world, instead of the things of the Spirit. We believe in symbols, and very little in realities—not enough to make us voluntarily give up the symbols for the Kingdom of God. And as we sow we reap, for the law of Spirit is inflexible. Much need have we to-day to cry with the disciples of old: "Increase our faith." And when Jesus said "Resist not him that is evil," he was speaking from his exalted attitude of consciousness, with the certain knowledge that the law of Spirit forbids resistance. Love alone is the solvent of all difficulty and dissension, although it may mean the sacrifice of one's bodily life.

And yet, Sir, in spite of believing thus, I agree that our statesmen have done the proper thing in resisting the Germans, and for this reason—that by so doing the Kingdom of God will come the sooner. Our motives in this case are clean, and those of our opponents full of hate, vindictiveness, and savagery; but the methods employed by both are wrong—who will defend acts of slaughter and destruction, as such?—and these methods cannot have the sanction of the Spirit of God or of Jesus Christ, who was the Interpreter of that Spirit. The end may justify the means in this case, but the means are bad; and let us acknowledge that so long as we use bad means we are not working in harmony with the Spirit of Christ or God. The alternative would have been to allow Germany to overrun Belgium, France, and England without saying them nay; but, by putting those countries under military and autocratic rule for years to come, and robbing the peoples of their inherited freedom (such as it is) and independence, I feel that the advent of the Kingdom of God on earth would have rested with a people much less competent to deal with it at the present time than we are. Hence we use death and destructive force, but with a clean motive, against death and destructive force with a sinister motive, because we, in our ignorance and only partial development on the spiritual side of our being, deem these things the best policy under the circumstances.

We shall learn by the bitter experience we are going through, and again seek God with a stronger will and purpose than before. "Man as yet is being made," wrote Tennyson, and he is touched into shape by often drastic means. But the spirit is there, waiting to manifest itself all the time, and as soon as we forsake our old ways of going on, and really and truly desire and work for the Kingdom of God, it will become a reality in us.—Yours, &c.

THE FUTURE OF ARMAMENTS.

SIR,—I am afraid Mr. Newell hardly realises what his interpretation of the saying "Resist not evil" commits him to. It means that he must never lock or bolt his house-door, that he must not raise his hand to protect a woman or child from a ruffian's blow, or even call for a policeman. It means that he must not pay rates for the upkeep of the police force, for what is that force but an organised resistance to evil, making it possible for him and for the rest of us to lead quiet and peaceable lives? I am not aware that in these matters Mr. Newell acts differently, or even thinks it would be right for him to act differently, from other people. The story he refers to of Jesus rebuking the disciple for drawing the sword against the high priest's servant, if authentic, simply reminds us, like the story of the driving of the money-changers from the Temple courts, that Jesus knew that there is a time to resist and a time not to resist—which is the point I wished to bring out in that part of my article which dealt with the subject.

Mr. Basil Martin does not convince me that the story of Jesus driving away the money-changers and merchants is incredible. It is not stated how many there were of them, and there may, indeed, have been only a few, but such a thing as one man putting many to flight is not unknown to real history. And, assuming the credibility of the narrative, I cannot agree with Mr. Martin that the force used was only spiritual. It is true, as he goes on to say, that the only way of really conquering an enemy is by loving him. But even while loving our enemy, and quite consistently with our love of him, we are bound, whenever possible, to protect ourselves and others from his violence and injustice. My article was not so much an attempt to justify war as to indicate a better way of settling disputes between nations—by an International Court, with an International Police as its executive. There are, as Mr. Walter Short points out in his interesting letter, many difficulties in the way of establishing and maintaining such a police, but as they are practically of the same kind as those that had to be faced in forming the civil police, they should not prove insuperable. When it is realised that an International Police is the only alternative to the race of armaments that has long been going on, and to a recurrence of such a dreadful world-cataclysm as is now taking place, the duty of peace lovers should become clear, and difficulties be gradually overcome.—Yours, &c. THE FIRST PEACE SOCIETY.

SIR,—Historical accuracy does not depend on the length of a letter or on any so-called "contention" it may contain, but on simple historical fact. You have raised the question in your columns, and have associated my name with it. May I ask you, therefore, to state the fact that the minute books of the Liverpool Peace Society, which have been, on your showing, kept since 1840, begin, like all well-kept records, with the formation of the Society in that year? No other documentary evidence is really necessary.—Yours, &c.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

THE STORY OF GARIBALDI. III.

As time went on, the majority of Garibaldi's followers, whom he had led, as we described last week, up into the Apennines, dropped off, unable to keep up or eager to regain their homes. Armies of Austrians, of French, Spaniards, and even Italians, closed in upon them. Throughout the month of July the flight was sustained over a track of more than 250 miles. But the end drew near. The little cannon, shouldered affectionately over the rocky heights, had to be left in a ravine. Some of the men were captured. Garibaldi had gone on in advance. Shots were heard, when Anita rode to the point of danger, rallying the rear-guard. At last a straggling band of 1,500 fugitives reached the gates of the free city of San Marino, built on the summit of a high mountain, and looking out over the Adriatic. Here Garibaldi disbanded his army, giving his men permission to return if they could to their homes.

At midnight he was sitting on a stone outside a café, his map and a lantern before him as he questioned three peasants. Suddenly he rose to his feet. "Whoever wishes to follow me," he cried, "I offer him fresh battles, sufferings, and exile; treaties with the foreigner never"; and, leaping on his horse, he rode out under the gateway, and 200 devoted men descended the mountain after him through the night.

Over the wild country they were guided by a working-man of San Marino. When, after a breathless race, they reached a village at the foot of the hills, and their way to the sea was clear, Garibaldi took his guide's hand, and said: "Good-bye, dear Zani; I thank you for your work. In ten years I hope to see you again, with better fortune." And so it befel, for in precisely ten years' time the good Zani came down from his mountain home again, and was welcomed by the Liberator of Italy.

That night, at a little seaport, Garibaldi and his men embarked on a fishing fleet, and put out on to a rough sea, hoping to reach Venice. His last act as he left the shore was to kiss the forehead of his horse, who had borne him so far and so well, giving him to a patriot of the town with the words: "Do what you will with him, but never let him pass into the hands of the Austrians." An hour later the enemy entered the port.

The day was fine, the wind favourable. Garibaldi's chief care was Anita, who was very ill, and there was no water on board to quench her burning thirst. A beautiful moonlight night followed, but, alas! the full moon proved fatal to the expedition. Passing round a headland, the flotilla of fishing boats sailed into the arms of the Austrian squadron. Most of them were captured, but the chief's boat with two others got away. In the morning they landed on a spit of marshland, Garibaldi with his suffering wife in his arms. At his order the rest dispersed to save themselves. He allowed only his friend Leggiere, though lame from a wound, to remain with him. To their great surprise a neighbouring citizen, who had seen the boats in flight and heard the firing, was there to welcome them. By him the fugitives were hidden in a farm-house, and afterwards moved to a place of greater safety. Hundreds of Austrian soldiers were searching the marshes, but in vain. The devoted Anita's strength, however, was exhausted, and she died in her husband's arms. The sorrow-smitten Garibaldi and his companion continued to hide, first on the islands in the lagoons, and afterwards in a great pine forest on the coast of the Adriatic. Through this forest the Austrians searched in every direction, and on one occasion passed by some bushes on the other side of which lay the two fugitives. Meanwhile the Young Italians of the district knew well the hiding-place, but no tyrant's bribe of gold, poor though many of them were, could induce them to betray their country's champion. With admirable skill and caution they planned his removal from one retreat to another, until the Apennines were reached. Still through the very midst of foes the two comrades passed, helped by a good parish priest and others, crossing the mountain ridges by little-known tracks—one hair-breadth escape after another. One evening they found themselves in the parlour of a wayside inn, amidst a party of soldiers out in pursuit of them. Surely a higher Power was guarding the life of this man of destiny for future service. At last the mountains were passed, the Tuscan shore was reached, and new friends smuggled Garibaldi and Leggiere out to sea. At Nice he saw his motherless children and his aged mother, and, sailing thence to Africa, found at Tangier a safe refuge.

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

MEETING OF THE COMMITTEE.

A MEETING of the Committee was held at the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on January 27, when there were present Mr. H. R. Rathbone (the President) in the chair, the Revs. W. T. Bushrod, R. N. Cross, Rudolf Davis, A. H. Dolphin, H. E. Dowson, E. Gwilym Evans, A. Hall, C. Hargrove, H. D. Roberts, C. Roper, M. Rowe, A. Leslie Smith, C. J. Street, Joseph Wood, Messrs. H. P. Greg, Ronald P. Jones, W. Byng Kenrick, G. H. Leigh, F. W. Monks, T. Fletcher Robinson, G. E. Verity, J. Wigley, G. W. R. Wood, and the Secretary (the Rev. James Harwood).

Among other items of business the following were dealt with:—

In reply to suggestions "on behalf of the coming Peace" from the Nederlandsche Anti-Oorlog Raad, and "on the reconstruction that is to follow the war," from the Council of the Union of Ethical Societies, it was agreed that at present no action on the part of the Conference was feasible.

A suggestion to issue a selection of Prayers for use during the war was referred to the officers, with instructions to seek the co-operation of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

The resolution adopted at the last meeting to postpone the Triennial Meetings of the Conference on account of the war was reconsidered at length in consequence of representations made outside the Committee. The whole circumstances were taken into account, and various suggestions were thrown out, but ultimately it was decided that the difficulties were such that the previous decision must be upheld.

The Treasurer's statement showed a balance in hand of £42 6s. 11d. On account of the Sustentation Fund Appeal the total promises now amount to £50,494 4s. 7d., of which £5,427 15s. 8d. has still to be received.

A motion by the Rev. H. D. Roberts suggesting a change in the present form of representation on the Board of Management of the Sustentation Fund was withdrawn after some discussion.

The Report on Public Worship was presented by the Chairman of the Special Committee (the Rev. Joseph Wood) in a speech in which he quoted passages (without mentioning names) from many of the replies received, and summarised the general position. The Report was received and ordered to be circulated. Its recommendations are to be considered at the next meeting of the Committee; but in the meantime, the Special Committee, with the view of saving time, was requested to take provisional steps for the preparation of a Form of Confirmation Service.

Owing to lack of time some business had to stand over till the next meeting, which it was agreed should be held in London at Whitsuntide.

THE FOUNDER OF WILLASTON SCHOOL.

MEMORIAL TABLET UNVEILED AT NANTWICH.

ON Wednesday, the 27th ult., there was unveiled at the Unitarian Chapel by the Right Hon. Sir John T. Brunner, Bart., a marble tablet bearing the following inscription: "In memory of Philip Barker. Died 1898. Aged 83. A devoted member and supporter of this church, and of Willaston School the founder." It has been placed in the wall on the opposite side of the pulpit to the one in memory of Dr. Joseph Priestley, who was minister of the chapel, 1758-61. The large audience which had assembled, representative of our churches in Crewe, Shrewsbury, Whitechurch, and elsewhere, as well as of practically every place of worship in the town, was in itself an eloquent tribute to Mr. Barker's memory. The meeting was presided over by Mr. E. S. Haighton; others who took part were Mr. J. F. L. Brunner, M.P. (President of the Unitarian Association), Mr. Wilfred Harlock, J.P., Mr. H. Lang Jones (Head Master of Willaston School), Ald. J. B. Willans, and the Revs. G. E. Evans, J. Morley Mills, Geo. Pegler, and J. Park Davies (minister). Among those who sent messages of regret for inability to be present were Mr. Albert Nicholson, Mr. T. A. Johnson, the Revs. W. A. Weatherall, D. J. Evans, G. A. Payne, W. Stephens, and Canon Rowland V. Barker.

In the course of a most interesting address, which struck throughout a reminiscent note, Sir John Brunner recalled how he had met Mr. Barker for the last time on the occasion of the laying of the foundation stone of the new wing of the schoolroom. What had always impressed him was the wonderful simplicity and uprightness of Mr. Barker's character. It was not without significance that he was generally known as plain "Philip" Barker. The reason for this he had discovered was that there ran in his veins a large mixture of Quaker blood. That might account for the further fact that his father had, in consequence of some disagreement with the rector, left the Established Church, of which he was warden, and had, after making a tour of the various chapels in Nantwich, finally found a congenial religious home along with his family of eight among the Unitarians. Philip, the youngest of the children, was educated by the Rev. James Hawkes. At an early age he became a Sunday School teacher. Soon after he was made Secretary, Treasurer, and Superintendent of the Sunday School. He also became about the same time acting Trustee and Treasurer of the Church. Some of these offices he held for a period of fifty-one years. He also occasionally occupied the pulpit. If there was anything he loved more passionately than another it was his Unitarianism. He was born, he lived, and he died a Unitarian. He helped the cause forward by giving not only of his wealth but also of his heart and mind. When his personal services were no longer available he continued his support by leaving to the chapel at Nantwich a generous endowment, and another legacy to the chapel at Crewe. Next to his religion stood his love for education. In order to secure for our boys instruction of the best kind, free from dogmatic ties, he bequeathed his house, the adjoining property, and a sum of £20,000 for the purpose of establishing Willaston School. This was done on condition that a similar amount be collected within a year of his death. This task was speedily accomplished. Evidence of Mr. Barker's love for education was also to be found in the fact that he had rendered valuable assistance in connection with the erection of the Nantwich Public Library.

Subsequent speakers all spoke in a similar strain. Mr. J. F. L. Brunner, M.P., said he did not have the pleasure of knowing Mr. Barker, but he felt sure from what had been said that day that he was a good and generous man. Were it otherwise a tablet would not have been raised to his memory sixteen years after his death. As a Governor of Willaston School he had no hesitation in saying that the boys who came under its influence would have good reason in after life to bless the name of Philip Barker. Attention was called by Mr. Lang Jones to the suggestive fact that in the School trust deed was a clause which laid it down that the boys be instructed in "sobriety, earnestness, intelligence, and piety." That statement, he felt sure, had been inserted as being expressive not merely of the wish, but also of the character of the founder.

Among the other speakers were the Revs. G. E. Evans, J. Morley Wills, and G. Pegler, and Ald. J. B. Willans.

A Religious Service was held in the evening conducted by the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson.

UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY COLLEGE.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THERE was a good attendance at the Annual Meeting on Wednesday at the Memorial Hall, Manchester, when the chair was occupied by the President, Mr. Richard D. Holt, M.P.

Among those present were Sir Wm. H. Talbot, Mr. G. H. Leigh, Mrs. Turner (Stockport), Mr. F. W. Monks and Mr. Edward Talbot (Chairman and Vice-Chairman of Committee), Mr. J. O. Kerfoot, the Revs. Dr. S. H. Mellone, H. McLachlan, W. L. Schroeder, E. G. Evans, E. L. H. Thomas, J. Ellis, C.

Peach, H. D. Roberts, J. C. Odgers, G. A. Payne (Hon. Clerical Secretary), and Messrs. J. Taylor Jones, J. Wigley, T. F. Robinson, and H. J. Broadbent.

In their Report for 1914, which was read by the Rev. G. A. Payne, the Committee expressed their pleasure in being able to record another year of steady progress. During the session 1913-14 there had been twelve students in residence, and their number had increased to fourteen (one being non-resident) in the session 1914-15. The Principal (Dr. Mellone), the Warden (the Rev. H. McLachlan), and Mrs. McLachlan had each contributed to the well-being of the students and to the efficiency of the institution, and their work was gratefully appreciated by the Committee. During the year the question of training the students for Sunday School work had been carefully considered, and a number of special addresses on a variety of subjects had been given by men of note who were not immediately connected with the College. Three of the students had passed into the regular ministry of our churches, and prizes and distinctions had been gained at the University by an unusually large number of men. A pleasing reference was made in the Report to the various gifts presented to the Institution during the year, among the more noteworthy being a cheque from the Halifax congregation for the foundation of a "Millson Prize" in History to be awarded at the close of each session.

Unfortunately, it was necessary to refer to many losses of old and valued friends, including Miss Emily Sharpe, a Vice-President since 1910; Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence, Bart., a past-President, who held that office for three years, and was a most generous benefactor; and the Rev. William Harrison, who had been a member of the Committee for thirty-three years. Reference was also made to 'The History of the College,' by the Rev. H. McLachlan, which had recently been published.

In the absence of Mr. J. Hall Brooks, Mr. F. W. Monks read the Treasurer's statement.

In moving the adoption of the Report, the Chairman congratulated the College on the number and the quality of the students, and urged the necessity for continued effort. The demeanour of the people of this country during the war, he considered, had been excellent, and there had been a remarkable sobriety in their general conduct. People were beginning to attach greater importance to personal conduct. Germany had lost the sympathy of all neutral states in throwing over the ordinary standards of virtue and conduct.

There was more necessity than ever for them to attend to the moral instruction of the nation. They must convince the people, and see that they remained convinced, that the Christian standard of ethics was the right standard. They wanted not only men well equipped in theological learning, but men capable of influencing the conduct of the people of this country, and therefore their work was of the utmost importance.

The officers for the ensuing year were elected on the proposition of the Rev. C. J. Street, who regretted the unavoidable absence of the Lay Secretary, Mr. P. J. Winser, and hoped he would soon be restored to health. He agreed with the President that the work of training the students was a work which must not be interfered with. It was a time when our students required the best possible training for spiritual leadership, and when the men who were in the ministry could not be spared from their posts. The best thanks of the meeting were accorded to the Visitors, Examiners, Hon. Auditors, and to the Hon. Medical Officer and Hon. Oculist.

The last resolution was one of thanks to Mr. Holt for consenting to renew his term of office as President, and for his services in the chair. This was proposed by the Principal, seconded by the Rev. J. C. Odgers, and carried with great heartiness.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Evesham.—On January 3 a Confirmation Service was held at Oat Street Chapel, when fifteen persons were welcomed into the fellowship of the Church. It is announced that a similar service will be conducted on Whit Sunday, May 23, if twelve candidates offer themselves and attend the Confirmation Class. The following question was addressed to each of the candidates by the minister:—"Do you here, in the presence of God and of this Congregation, by your own voluntary act, take upon yourself the obligations of a disciple of Christ, and freely and openly desire to join the fellowship of this Church and the larger fellowship of the Church of Christ?" To which each answered:—"I do."

Leigh.—The appointment of a minister for the pulpit of the Twist Lane Church, now vacant, is in the hands of the Church Committee and Congregation, with Mr. Ellis Pennington as Secretary, and the North and East Lancashire Unitarian Mission with Rev. E. D. Priestley Evans as Secretary, and Rev. J. J. Wright as Chairman. Leigh, Astley, and Croft are, in various ways, linked up with Chowbent Chapel. With a handsome church and schoolroom erected and still supported by the Mission, in a town of over 40,000 inhabitants, Leigh Church and School, having some ardent young people and faithful older adherents, offer, in the opinion of both committees, great scope for a vigorous and practical ministry.

London: Lay Preachers' Union.—The monthly meeting of the Lay Preachers' Union was held on Friday, January 29, when Dr. Moritz Weston, of Croydon, gave an address on 'The Art of Preaching.' He considered that there was an art in this branch of work, that art was life, and that to be a successful preacher a minister must strike home into the hearts of his congregation, appeal to their inner consciousnesses, and speak straight from the heart. He urged the speaking without notes, so as to get at closer grips with his hearers. There was an absolute need for emotion in oneself; in other words, a man must love God in the highest and best sense, if he was to be His noblest ambassador. Dr. Weston concluded by stating that the duty of the preacher was not so much to pander to people's sense of what is fitting, but to make them think. Questions followed by members of the Union.

Manchester: Fallsworth.—Last Saturday Mr. and Mrs. Henry Shepherd entertained 200 guests in the Dob Lane School-Room to celebrate their Golden Wedding. Friends were also present from the churches at Dukinfield and Stalybridge with which Mr. and Mrs. Shepherd were formerly connected.

Newbury.—The members of the Temperance Society, having arranged to have a Lantern Lecture on January 28 on 'Belgium: Before the War, and Since,' the Rev. R. Newell, with the kind assistance of the Mayor, conveyed an invitation to the Belgian Refugees in Newbury to attend and see the pictures of their native land. A large number responded to the invitation, and about fifty photographic views were thrown upon the screen, depicting the fine cathedrals, churches, hotels des ville, belfries, bridges, towers, &c., of the capital, chief cities, and towns—Ypres, Courtray, Tournay, Termonde, Namur, Dinant, Huy, Louvain, Brussels, Waterloo, Oudenarde, Malines, Antwerp, Ghent, Bruges, and Ostend. The pictures were described by Mr. T. H. Stillman, who visited Belgium a year ago. During an interval the Belgian portion of the audience stood and sang their National Anthem, Miss F. Newell accompanying on the piano. Mr. Frank Wright also sang English versions of the Russian National Anthem and the French 'Marseillaise.' The Belgian guests seemed greatly delighted as they recognised several of the places, and expressed in a few words of broken English and by gestures, their appreciation of the entertainment.

North Cheshire Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The Quarterly Meeting of the Union was held at Gorton on Saturday last, attended by about 70 adults and 40 children of the Sunday School. After tea, a committee meeting was held for the transaction of business, including the preliminary arrangements for school visiting during the year. The President (Rev. H. E. Perry) presided, and also at the evening meeting, where he was supported by the Rev. H. E. Dowson, Mr. George Cocks, and Mr. A. Slater (Hon. Sec.). A resolution of sympathy was passed with the relatives of Mr. E. B. Broadrick, who acted as Hon. Secretary from 1871 to 1886, and was President in 1901-2, several members speaking to the resolution. Mr. George Cocks read a paper on 'Morning Attendance at Sunday School,' and a short discussion followed, in which the Revs. J. Ellis, L. Short, H. E. Dowson, Mr. J. W. Wild, and the President took part. Mr. Cocks replied to the discussion, and to a hearty vote of thanks accorded to him on the motion of Mr. J. Whitworth, seconded by the Rev. N. J. H. Jones. The chairman moved and Mr. T. Robinson seconded a vote of thanks to the Gorton friends for their arrangements, and the Rev. A. Thornhill responded.

Nottingham.—Mr. Harry F. B. Bryan, youngest son of Mr. George Bryan, the general secretary of the Nottingham Mechanics' Institution, and Financial Warden of the High Pavement Congregation, was a wireless operator on board the Tokomaru, which was torpedoed by a German submarine off the French coast last Saturday morning. Mr. Harry Bryan has arrived home in safety after his alarming experience. In a press interview he states that the vessel was torpedoed without the slightest warning.

Oldbury.—A United Guilds Meeting was held at Oldbury on Saturday, January 30, members from Birmingham, Moseley, Walsall, Coseley, Handsworth, Lye, Oldbury, and Dudley being present. Miss M. Twist of Birmingham read a paper on 'The Formation and Maintenance of Junior Guilds,' in the course of which she gave an interesting account of work done in connection with the Old Meeting Guild. The Secretary, the Rev. E. Glyn Evans, read a suggestion by the Rev. H. Fisher Short that a simple creed should be memorised by the members of all Junior Guilds, which was followed by a discussion in which the Revs. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, H. C. Hawkins, W. J. Topping, and Messrs. Davies and Croft of Birmingham took part.

Pendleton.—Some forty wounded soldiers from neighbouring hospitals, in addition to a party of Belgian refugees and some Red Cross nurses, were entertained to tea on January 30 at the Unitarian Church, Mr. T. Fletcher Robinson presiding. The invitations were sent out at the instance of Miss McDowell, who, with a number of capable helpers, had arranged an excellent programme.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

"INNOCENT ALIEN ENEMIES."

The Emergency Committee for the Assistance of Germans, Austrians, and Hungarians in Great Britain rendered destitute by the War has just published its second report, giving an account of the work done up to the end of 1914. The Committee has had from the start the full approval and assistance of the Home Office, as well as of the American Embassy, and has worked in co-operation with other philanthropic bodies organized on similar lines in order to avoid the danger of overlapping. The work has been arduous, and shows no signs of decreasing. It is a pathetic fact that most of the applicants ask first of all for work, but although it is sometimes easy to obtain a situation for such of the women as have been domestic servants before marriage, it is almost impossible at the present time, for obvious reasons, to find employment for the men. Many warm-hearted English people have offered hospitality, and much help has been given to the maternity cases. The important task of visiting the detention camps has also been undertaken by several friends, and the kindly messages and gifts which they were able to deliver at Christmas were very greatly appreciated.

A GRAND-NEPHEW OF SIR RANDAL CREMER.

The name of Cremer is destined to be honoured in relation to war no less than peace. An account has recently appeared in the papers of the decoration with the medal for conspicuous gallantry of Able Seaman Ernest Randal Cremer, who, with great presence of mind and courage, cut away a mine which fouled submarine E6. He is the grand-nephew, says The Arbitrator, of the late Sir Randal Cremer, and the son of Mr. William Cremer, of Swanwick, near Southampton, who has three other sons serving in the navy in the North Sea.

"FROM WAR TO PEACE."

In a letter from Earl Grey drawing attention to the meeting in connection with the "From War to Peace" movement to be held at the Kingsway Theatre, on Monday, February 8, at 4.30, it is stated that a resolution will be proposed by Dr. Lyttelton, the Head Master of Eton, urging the necessity of the establishment of a peace which will secure the collective responsibility of all civilized nations for the maintenance and enforcement of international law. The letter proceeds:—"The expulsion of the Germans from Belgium, and the crushing of Prussian militarism are the necessary preliminaries to such a peace, and to this every energy of our nation must be directed; but it seems to me that this energy will get new force if the great end to be obtained after the war is kept clearly before the public mind. To assist in doing this is the object of the meeting." Tickets of admission can be obtained on application to Mr. Mark H. Judge, 7, Pall Mall, S.W.

AN AMERICAN FRIEND OF DICKENS.

The death is announced of Mrs. James T. Fields, a familiar figure in Boston and Cambridge, whose house in earlier days was frequented by Emerson, Hawthorne, Whittier, and other well-known literary men of New England. She was the widow of James T. Fields, the publisher, and had numerous friends, by whom she was respected and beloved, on both sides of the Atlantic. Mr. Fields had a great deal to do with the arrangements for Charles Dickens's readings in the United States, and he and his wife entertained Dickens at their house, and were his guests in turn at Gadshill a year before his death. Two of Dickens's last stories were written respectively for a child's magazine and The Atlantic Monthly, published by Ticknor & Fields. After her husband died, Mrs. Fields and Sarah Orne Jewett, her intimate friend, who died a few years ago, travelled a good deal in Europe, and interested themselves in the new generation of writers, of whom the most notable were William and Henry James.

THE FIRST MESSAGE OF SÚFISM TO THE WEST.

Music and mysticism play a great part in the religious teaching of the Súfis, a number of whom have come to England on a mission to the people of the West. Mr. Inayat Khan, the leader of the band, who is giving a series of twelve lectures at the rooms of the Royal Asiatic Society, under the presidency of Lady Muir Mackenzie, is a grandson of Moula Bux, the inventor of the modern Hindu music notation, and is himself a fine performer on the veena. Súfism had its origin in Persia in the eighth century, and those who adopted it, despising worldly ostentation and personal adornment, wore a white woollen garment from which the name of their sect is really derived, as súf means wool. One of their writers has said, "the Súfis are folk who have preferred God to everything," and Mr. Khan claims that they represent a brotherhood with no distinction of race, colour, or creed, aiming at unity with God.

TEMPERANCE AMONG THE INDIAN TROOPS.

We drew attention recently to the action taken by the Anglo-Indian Temperance Association in regard to the supply of rum rations to the Indian troops now serving at the front. It was pointed out, in a letter to Lord Kitchener, that this constituted a grave temptation which many of the men would not be able to withstand, in spite of the fact that most of them belong to abstemious races. A reply has now been received from the War Office in which it is stated that the rum is only issued under the strictest supervision, and when considered necessary by the General Officer Commanding, on the recommendation of the Medical Officer. The issue is limited to Hindus, and on occasions when rum is considered necessary for them, tea may be issued as a substitute to those who object, and to other Indian troops. The Anglo-Indian Association is informed that every care will be taken to guard against the evils referred to in the letter addressed to Lord Kitchener.

THE ORGANISATION OF RELIEF.

A paper on 'Organisation,' which was read by the Rev. Charles Hargrove at Leeds last November, is published in the Charity Organisation Review for January. In the course of his remarks Mr. Hargrove attempted to define the principles underlying the activities of the Society, which has often incurred criticism on the ground that it spends so much in comparison with what it gives. "It is not our ambition," he said, "to do other people's work for them or give other people's alms in place of their giving it themselves. What we want is to be allowed to point out how the work can best be done and the giving be most useful, and to bring together workers and givers; so dealing with a single case, we may bring to bear upon it medical advice, convalescent home, baby's welcome, employer's contribution, and our own effort to procure work—all this not without much thought and inquiry and correspondence—without spending a penny in direct relief. This is organisation of relief, and this is our speciality among the charities."

POLISH MESSIANISM.

In a recent article in The Challenge, Mr. Edmund Gardner describes the Messianic faith of Poland held by the followers of Towianski, a Lithuanian mystic, who founded a body known as the Servants of the Work of God, which had its headquarters among the Polish exiles in Switzerland. Towianski died in 1878. When he first appeared in Paris he found the Polish emigration divided by political intrigues, but through his influence the finest spirits among them abandoned revolutionary activities, and became convinced "that the infallible way of salvation for nations is love and the accomplishment of the law of Christ." Towianski believed that the Word of God must first come to individuals, then to the nations, and that the peculiar mission of Poland to the world is to purify it by her sufferings, for she is the one nation that possesses no territory, and in its totality has followed Christ along the road to the Cross. In his book 'Les Slaves' Adam Mickiewicz lays down the three cardinal points of Messianism as a philosophy as follows:— "First, necessity of a sacrifice. We cannot begin any action, or any fruitful labour of thought, without a preliminary sacrifice. Secondly, the Christian mission of the Polish nation, which is compelled to die and to be born again. Thirdly, the universal significance of this Messianism for the human race." Mickiewicz, like Towianski, believed that Poland must forget all the horrors from which she had suffered, and regard the Russians as brothers. "Conquests and provinces are words which should be erased from the dictionary of the future. May Russia be great and happy, according to the destiny that God has assigned to her."

BIRDS IN THE WAR AREA.

Members of the Ligue Française pour la Protection des Oiseaux have been asked to contribute to the meetings to be held during the winter and spring any observations bearing on the effect upon birds of either the present war or that of 1870. So far, we learn from Bird Notes and News, there do not seem to have been any abnormal movements in the bird world such as might have been expected, although a northerly migration of species which usually go south is said to have been noted on the East Coast in October. Many people in Great Britain thought we might see a huge immigration of feathered fugitives, but it is hardly probable that birds without the migratory instinct, and unaccustomed to the migration routes to Britain, would cross the seas from Europe. Soldier ornithologists have commented on the absence of birds in Belgian fields and forests, but in a thickly populated and closely cultivated land such as Belgium was bird life is not as abundant as in England.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.

We want to call special attention to the information about our Belgian Hospital Fund, which will be found in our leading article to-day. We hope that all who read it will be convinced of three things. Firstly, that the need is great and pressing. Secondly, that we are in the happy position of being able to cope with it in a quick and business-like way, with a minimum of delay and a minimum of expense. And, thirdly, that our Fund must grow into a much bigger thing than we contemplated at first if it is to be worthy of our people, with their noble traditions of philanthropy and their belief in the religion of brotherhood and kindness. One further word we may add in answer to an inquiry which has reached us this week: the accounts of the Fund will be audited, and a full statement will be published when the work is completed.

No very clear official statement has been made of the financial arrangements among the Allies, which have just been concluded in Paris. They must, of course, be examined carefully by experts from the business point of view. As a war measure they will be justified if they effect a more even distribution of the necessities of life and a more equal sharing of burdens. An alliance must be for suffering as well as for victory. Here, however, we are impressed chiefly by the possibilities which an arrangement of this kind opens up for the future. Peoples who have co-operated closely in this way in time of war are less likely to drop back into the old antagonisms as soon as peace is concluded. Is there not here a possible beginning of the moderating influence of international feeling upon trade rivalries, a public recognition of the mutuality of commerce in a world which is hard driven by competition and self-interest?

THE possibility that the use of neutral flags may confuse and frustrate the submarine menace has naturally called forth a good deal of angry comment in Germany. It is a well-established practice. The United States has decided that she has no ground of complaint, and Germany is the last Power with a right to complain after the exploits of the Emden, which called forth no official protest on our side. At the same time, to the ordinary civilian mind this use of a neutral flag seems very like an abuse, and many people are not quite comfortable in defending it. But here, we think, it is right to make a distinction. When a neutral flag is used by a warship in order to get within easy firing distance of the enemy we have a feeling that it is not quite fighting fair. In the case of peaceful commerce the case is different. Here the act is not for offence, but for protection against unlawful attack. It is in the interest of all trading ships to make common cause against threats of indiscriminate destruction. If the use of a neutral flag makes violent and unlawful action of this kind more difficult, it is something better than a stratagem of war for our own advantage. It helps to maintain the time-honoured law of the sea, in which Neutrals are as much interested as ourselves.

* * *

THE statements made about the Expeditionary Force in the House of Commons this week were, on the whole, very satisfactory. The Prime Minister stated that in the western area of the war the casualties up to February 4 were approximately 104,000 of all ranks. This is a large figure, but until it is analysed into killed, permanently disabled, and slightly wounded we cannot well face all that it implies. All that we can say is that, terrible as it is, it is no larger than we could reasonably expect in face of the huge losses which have occurred in the other armies. One very satisfactory feature has been the good health of the troops and their remarkable immunity from epidemic disease. The Under Secretary for War stated that there had only been 421 cases of typhoid in the present campaign among British troops, and of these 305 were in men who had not been inoculated within two years. In the 421 cases there had been 35 deaths. Of these deaths 34 were men who had not been inoculated within two years. Only one death occurred among patients who were inoculated, and that man had only been inoculated once instead of the proper number of times, viz., twice.

THESE are very remarkable figures, and they have naturally given rise to a demand for compulsory inoculation in many quarters. It is clear that inoculation as a measure of safety is useless, unless it is adopted almost universally. It would not be right to allow small groups of men to endanger the health and efficiency of the whole army. The argument against compulsion is that the remedy is a new one, and from the scientific point of view it is still on its trial. It is not a matter upon which we are competent to express an opinion, for the evidence is very technical, and needs to be sifted by highly trained minds. We should, however, have no hesitation in urging men to be inoculated on the ground that there is a great deal of evidence in its favour. It does not seem to us the right occasion for debating general principles or for pressing the argument that all forms of inoculation must necessarily be futile and wrong. Let it be granted that there is a difference of opinion; but the enemy is at the gate. It is wiser at the moment to take risks with the great weight of medical opinion than against it. After the war all the evidence can be sifted with scientific care, and the ordinary citizen will have much better grounds for forming an opinion of his own on the matter than is possible at present.

ONE of the most impressive lessons in the value of temperance which the world has ever seen is being taught us by Russia. In spite of the fact that the vast revenue derived from the tax on vodka was surrendered in the first six months of the war, the income from the taxes of the country rose by £15,500,000 over that of the year 1913. The general conclusion of the Finance Minister, M. Bark, is that their more temperate habits have made the people more productive, and therefore more able to bear the economic strain of the war. In an interview with the Paris correspondent of The Morning Post last week, he made the following remarkable statement:—

As regards the Budget for 1915, I have no fear. The loss of revenue from vodka will be met partly by economies, partly by fresh taxation, and partly by increased revenue from existing taxes. When I say that I have no fear for the future I am relying on the fact that the suppression of the vodka traffic has increased the productiveness of our people by between 30 and 40 per cent. The people have also increased their rate of saving, and have thus diverted their money into productive channels. Take, for instance, the position of the savings banks. As a result of the war nearly £4,000,000 was withdrawn, but on the totals the year 1914 has shown an increase of £8,500,000 over 1913, while the year 1913 only showed an increase of £3,800,000 over 1912. The difference is especially marked for December. This year deposits exceeded withdrawals by £2,900,000, while in December, 1913, the excess was only £65,700.

It is clearly the duty of all who take an active interest in social questions to watch very closely the proposals which are cropping up in many quarters to turn children of school age into wage-earners, and to employ a large number of women in agricultural labour. In both directions there is danger that we may drift back into a condition of things from which we have slowly emerged. If there is sufficient evidence that there are not men enough left to sow the fields and to gather the harvest, then their wives may have to take their place as a temporary measure. But it must not be done for the sake of cheapness, or in careless oblivion of the fact that a great deal of agricultural work is physically unsuitable for the mothers of the race.

THE National Free Church Council has issued a draft of the programme for the meetings which will be held in Manchester from March 8 to 11. The arrangements have been somewhat simplified, and more time than usual will be allowed for discussion. One feature, which is significant of the closer sympathies which have been evoked by recent events, will be a Service of Intercession in the Cathedral conducted by Dean Welldon, in which some Free Church ministers will be invited to take part. Naturally the problem of the war from a Christian point of view will occupy a central place on the programme.

ON the subject of the special service which is being arranged in the Cathedral Dean Welldon has addressed the following words to The Manchester Guardian:—

Such a service, if it could take place, as I earnestly hope it may, would be a remarkable instance of good feeling among Christians of different denominations at a time when the supreme interest of the country seems to demand more than ever a co-ordination of all its moral and spiritual forces. It would be a signal instance, too, of the higher Christianity which refuses to look upon differences among Christians as absolutely barring the way to religious sympathy or common worship. But neither on the side of the Church nor on that of the National Free Church Council would the service, I am confident, be approved if it were felt to involve any sacrifice or compromise of principle.

All this is excellent in intention, and is a small step in the direction of religious co-operation. But the service will be a maimed rite, for the simple reason that there are menacing legal penalties if the Nonconformist minister were to take any equal share in conducting worship within the walls of a consecrated building.

IT is with sincere regret that we have to announce the death of Mr. S. Barton Worthington of Manchester at the patriarchal age of 95 years. When he retired many years ago from his arduous duties as one of the chief engineers on the London & North Western Railway, he placed his ripe experience at the disposal of his fellow-citizens, and entered public life as a member of the Manchester City Council at an age when most men feel that they have earned their rest. But this civic patriotism and unstinted devotion to duty were characteristic of his whole career. He represented the best traditions of the Liberal Nonconformity in which he had been trained. Cross Street Chapel, Manchester, of which he was the oldest trustee, and Manchester College, Oxford, on the Committee of which he served for a long period, embodied for him the spirit of reverent and fearless Christian freedom, which was essential to his own religious life. A man of few words, those who came nearest to him knew how the fire of strong conviction burned within. To the end he retained his eager interest in life, his chivalrous loyalty to causes of freedom and progress, and his love of great books. We hope to give some account of his career next week.

THE Annual Meeting of the Sustentation Fund for the Augmentation of Ministers' Stipends was held in London on Wednesday. The managers were able to present a most encouraging report. During the year a large part of the new £50,000 fund has become available, and the scheme for providing minimum salaries has come into operation. Naturally some of the work has been tentative in character—experience and public criticism will suggest many adjustments. The policy adopted has been not to allow a contribution from the central fund to produce any slackening of local effort. In a few cases this may have caused disappointment; but the managers—apart from the fact that even with the new fund they are not in possession of a bottomless purse—are firmly convinced that, as a general rule, it is in the interest of ministers themselves to require adequate effort on the part of the congregation. In all the difficult work of the past year the fund has had an ideal chairman in Mr. Byng Kenrick, of whose clearness of judgment and tactful sympathy it is impossible to speak too highly. He is succeeded by Sir Edgar Chatfield Clarke, who has earned the confidence of his colleagues and the churches by his former services as treasurer for eighteen years.

A BULLETIN OF NEWS.

OUR Belgian Hospital Fund is growing very satisfactorily, and what is still better it has already brought relief from suffering, and a good deal of comfort and happiness to a large number of wounded men. We are in a position to place everything that is sent to us just where it is wanted without muddling or overlapping or official delay. This is due to the splendid services of the able business man—we are not allowed to mention his name—who superintends personally the distribution of clothing and hospital requisites. He returned from one of his constant visits to the North of France on Wednesday, and brought us the welcome intelligence that the large consignment of goods which he took out for us has reached its destination, and that five hospitals for Belgian wounded are better equipped for their work on account of it. He confirms, what we have stated more than once before, that no one else is doing this particular piece of work. The gratitude in these hospitals is most touching when they find that some English friends have remembered them, and are giving them just what they need.

We have been able to establish a central depot at one of the French ports through the kindness of an English gentleman who has given us the temporary use of a room in his factory. There our bales and packages are unpacked, and the contents sorted ready for distribution. But our friend is not only a master of business detail, he has also the adroit manner which does not yield to the difficulties and scruples of the official mind. He has come into close touch with the Belgian military and medical authorities, who have welcomed him most cordially, and expressed their deep gratitude for what we are doing. A few days ago the word of command went forth from headquarters that special lists of requisites were to be prepared for our use. These lists from fourteen hospitals were placed in our hands on Wednesday afternoon, and early next week we hope to dispatch 2,500 garments and a large consignment of hospital utensils and drugs.

Last Sunday an interesting procession might have been observed travelling from our depot to a town some miles away. It consisted of a motor car and two large motor lorries kindly placed at our disposal by the British Red Cross authorities, as the Belgian Army is unprovided with transport vehicles of the right size. At the end of the journey our friend set to work at once, with the help of four English orderlies, to unpack and distribute the goods, a fine room in the Town Hall being used for the purpose.

Medical requisites must be the first claim upon our Fund. The lists which we have received reveal an appalling lack of the simplest necessities, and nothing will appeal so directly to the hearts of the devoted doctors, who are working under circumstances of terrible difficulty, as the things which they need to save their patients' lives, or to lessen their sufferings. But we also need clothes. We can dispose of all the suitable clothing which is sent to us. There is an urgent demand for army boots, and these we must buy as far as our funds permit. We commend this particular need to our men readers, who know what it means on a long tramp to be comfortably shod.

Having given this hint to the masculine mind, there is a more serious word which we want to address to the womanhood of our churches. These hospitals are admirably staffed, so far as the doctors are concerned, but there is a great dearth of nurses. Our friend in talking with us about the impressions of his visit said that good nursing was the greatest need of all. Are there any among our readers who are qualified to volunteer for this service, and in a position to pay their own expenses? Are there others, unable to do the work themselves, who will put it in our power to send over some skilled nurses?

Of course this would mean a large extension of our work; but we are not in the least dismayed. So long as our efforts lag behind the need we ought not to be satisfied. And we have the power to do it, if we resolve it shall be done. No other form of corporate service has been suggested into which our churches can pour their help as their special gift to the common cause. In some directions the service already being rendered is quite equal to the need. In others it may be suspected that it is not being wisely directed. But here is a neglected corner of the field, surpassed by none in the urgency of its appeal for help, which we have been fortunate enough to discover. There is no overlapping. There is no delay. We are in possession of the first-hand information and the business machinery and experience which will enable us to do the work effectively. It has come to us as a providential duty. We hope that our Churches will respond to it with such noble and large-hearted generosity, that long after the war is over the story of how we helped the Belgian Hospitals will be told to our children's children.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

PARTING.

BUT when he saw me standing on the shore,
Among the others, ready to depart,
At the boat's side, Ugo came up to me,
And took my hand in his, and said to me:
"Farewell, Antonio;—for we part to-day,
And who can tell whether we meet again
Out of this peril that we pass unto?
And now I thank thee for this love of thine,
Which thou hast given me out of thy true heart,
And for thy faithful service, and thy prayers,
In which forget not to remember me
Still, as I thee. We both have need of prayers
This hour. And if a hard doom come to thee,
And cruel death, or crueller life by thine,
Rejoice then to have suffered for God's sake,
And for our Italy's, and for all men's.
It may be one of us shall perish now,
And one of us be left alive: and though
No more thou hear the voice nor feel the hand
Thou lovest, yet thou art not desolate;
I leave thee to a better Friend than I.
Love Him, and trust Him, follow Him with pains,
—Not easily—the grace is for the strife;
And whatsoever trial He may lay Upon thee, trust Him through it, and give thanks;
And when thy heart is heavy, think on Him,

And when thy need is greatest, call on Him.
Hold fast God's promise, and remember this—Christ will not fail thee, though Fra Ugo may."
Then we were parted—and the end was come.

GIVE me my scallop-shell of quiet,
My staff of faith to walk upon,
My scrip of joy, immortal diet,
My bottle of salvation,
My gown of glory, hope's true gage ;
And thus I'll take my pilgrimage.

RALEGH.

O GOD, our true Life, in whom and by whom all things live, Thou com-mandest us to seek Thee, and art ready to be found ; Thou biddest us knock, and openest when we do so. To know Thee is life, to serve Thee is freedom, to enjoy Thee is a kingdom, to praise Thee is the joy and happiness of the soul. I praise, and bless, and adore Thee, I worship Thee, I glorify Thee, I give thanks to Thee for Thy great glory. I humbly beseech Thee to abide with me, to reign in me, to make this heart of mine a holy temple, a fit habitation for Thy Divine majesty. O thou Maker and Preserver of all things, visible and invisible ! keep, I beseech Thee, the work of Thine own hands, who trusts in Thy mercy alone for safety and protection. Guard me with the power of Thy grace, here and in all places, now and at all times, for evermore. Amen.

RIGHT OR WRONG?

It is a matter of first importance in any of our undertakings that we should be fully persuaded in our own minds that we are doing the right thing. Only if that be so can we really put our heart and strength into the work, only so achieve or, indeed, deserve success. If then any one, while agreeing that we must do some given thing, should, nevertheless, tell us that what we are doing is wrong, he puts us in a serious dilemma, and, so far as his words have weight with us, makes our hearts faint and our actions feeble.

Some such teaching, and that from authority which cannot be ignored, has been heard in relation to our participation in the war. The position taken up seems to be somewhat as follows : The nations, including our own, have by their past conduct brought about a state of things of which the war is a natural, if not the inevitable, outcome. To engage in war is a wrong thing to do. Yet when this war broke out we had no choice, we were bound to take a part in it. Under the circumstances which then existed, and for which it is said we were in part responsible, we had no alternative to doing what must, nevertheless, be described as wrong. No possibility of doing what could be called right existed. At best it became a choice between different kinds of wrongdoing. It is conceded that we had the grace to choose the least wrong, but we must not think of ourselves as doing right.

Now such a way of stating our case must tend towards a paralysis of mind and will, towards robbing us of all joy in and readiness to make sacrifice for the cause which it is admitted we are bound to uphold. It must set our feet on the path which leads through dismay to defeat. Surely there must be some fallacy underlying a doctrine which involves such contradictions and threatens such consequences, which, while admitting the obligation to take a certain course of action, nevertheless brands that action as wrong.

Does not the fallacy lie in setting up a mistaken standard whereby the rightness of our action is to be judged ; in tacitly postulating a set of circumstances which do not exist, and of possibilities which are not open, and then from the point of view there obtained estimating the moral value of action based upon the really existing facts ? An absolute standard is set up, or rather guessed at, for, after all, we are not capable of knowing exactly what a perfect being under the most favourable circumstances would do. Rightness is confused with perfection. For us "right" and "wrong" must be relative terms : relative, that is, to our own capacities and insight, and to the circumstances under which we have to act. What meaning has the word "right" for us, and as applied to our own actions, if it be not to do the best we can at the moment when we have to act ?

Because under other circumstances some other course of action might be possible, and would be preferable if it were possible, we ought not to institute a comparison between the actually and the hypothetically possible, and call the former wrong and the latter alone right. "Some things are in our power, and some things are not in our power. We have to do with the things that are in our power."

It may well be a cause of regret to us that we are partly responsible for the present circumstances, that if we had acted differently in the past something different would have been in our power to-day. Our past action may well be one of the things to be considered in deciding what is right to be done now. But we must not let our regrets for our past mistakes, if we have made them, hamper us in doing the only right thing which now remains possible to us. It is folly thus to strengthen the grip in which the past already holds us ; folly and weakness when thus

The native hue of resolution
Is sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought ;
And enterprises of great pith and moment,
With this regard their currents turn awry,
And lose the name of action.

It should be noted that the admitted impossibility of our refusing to take a part in the war is definitely a moral one. Strictly speaking, it was possible for us to have stood aside while Germany wreaked her will upon Belgium and France, and cleared the ground for a future dealing with ourselves ; just as it is always in a sense possible for the honest man to steal and the truthful man to lie. We would not so stand aside just because we felt in our hearts and consciences that it would be morally wrong to do so. It is no mere lust of battle or outburst of hatred that has been our motive power. We are not out for vengeance, but we dare not shrink from the responsibility which the possession of strength imposes upon us of withstanding and repressing evil. We have acted because we believed it was right so to act, and assuredly we are right in calling our action right—right, that is, for us at the time and under the circumstances in which we found ourselves ; right with a rightness which is not to be converted into a kind of wrongness by comparison with a different course of action which might have been possible under different circumstances.

If any among us thinks that, when the crisis came we could and ought to have acted otherwise than we did, then he undoubtedly has the right to tell us that we are doing wrong, and to abstain from aiding and abetting us. Let us not seek to make him suffer for his opinions. Let him be welcome to share in the fruits of the victory which we hope to win. His position, though we may lament it, is intelligible, and should be respected. But if language is to continue to have its ordinary meaning, if we are not to conclude that we live in a world in which it is never possible for any man really to do right—for that is the logical outcome of the doctrine we are considering—if our present is not to be hopelessly ruined by our past, then the position of those who tell us that we cannot do right in this matter to-day is not intelligible. Moreover, it is a position which, if generally adopted, must lead to disaster. For who can carry to a successful issue an action which, in his inmost heart, he calls wrong ? Let us have the courage of our convictions, and hesitate not to call that right which was the only thing morally possible for us to do.

Finally, it may be said that, after all, this is merely a question of words. I think it goes deeper than that ; but even if it does not, let us remember that words have power—power to wound and depress, power also to uplift and inspire. Is it not the duty of all who admit that we could not do other than we did to abstain from using words in such a way as to weigh down our hearts and weaken our resolution in the performance of our duty ?

THE INTERNATIONAL STANDPOINT.

SIR,—In your issue of January 30, in a letter headed 'The Future of Armaments,' the Rev. Walter Short raises the question of the international standpoint. He says: "Under internationalism a man may be a Nationalist, but he must be a citizen of the world as well." In this connection I should like to call attention to the sermon on 'Nationalism and Super-Nationalism' in the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas's recently published book 'The Immorality of Non-Resistance.' Mr. Lloyd Thomas appears to me to have laid hold of the principle which should underlie our patriotism. He deprecates "the over-weening pride that fails to recognise the providential place and function of other states in the community of peoples," but points out the value of the individuality of nations. He says: "The moral and religious basis and justification of all true patriotism" is "in the recognition that all nations are complementary and co-operative, having their own characteristic contributions to make to the Commonwealth of Man." From this it follows that world-citizenship does not make patriotism an optional claim, but that a man must first of all be loyal to the best ideals and traditions of his own nation—to alter the emphasis of Mr. Short's words, he must be a Nationalist that he may be a more effective citizen of the world.—Yours, &c.

FORCE IS NO REMEDY.

SIR,—I should like, with your permission, to make a few comments upon this subject. Those who disbelieve in war are not necessarily opposed to the use of every kind of physical force. Many things are good in moderation, and altogether bad in excess. This is the case, probably, with most virtues. You may believe in the wisdom of exercising some degree of force to maintain order in your own family and State, and yet think it utterly wrong to send forth an army of soldiers to kill and be killed. It may be difficult to draw a logical line, but that applies to every ethical question. A man may be full of patriotic feeling, and ready to give his life for his country, and yet hesitate to shoot another who is only doing his duty at the bidding of his king, and fighting (as he believes) in defence of his fatherland. The curious thing is that at the present moment the people of every country think they are fighting in self-defence. Whatever may be the ambition of certain statesmen or military rulers, every vote of supplies for army and navy in Germany and elsewhere has been obtained on the plea that the country is in danger.

A man may think that, however humiliating it may be to be ruled over by a foreigner, even that would be better than the slaughter of innocent men who have no animosity towards each other, the desolation of homes, and the arousing of antagonism or hatred for years to come. After all, some of the noblest lives have been lived and some of the finest literature produced by men of a subject race:—

Stone walls do not a prison make,
Nor iron bars a cage.

Many people feel that the effort to destroy militarism by war can only end in the establishment of more militarism in England and other lands, and that the Prussian spirit can only be subdued by the Germans themselves. The more it is opposed by hostile powers the stronger it will grow. In any case it is difficult to see how any purpose, however good, can justify such barbarities as are now being perpetrated on both sides, whether we consider the suffering on the battlefield, or the flinging of bombs upon private houses, or the attempt to put women and children to death by the slow torture of starvation through cutting off supplies of food.—Yours, &c.

LETTER OR SPIRIT.

SIR,—Your correspondents who have written under the headings 'The Total Failure of the Church' and 'A Better Way than War' seem to me, generally, to have become entangled by that error which has for ever been tripping up the would-be followers of Christ. I mean the error that Christianity is a method instead of a spirit. It is the same error, and is fraught with the same consequences, as that which leads people to think that belief in a particular creed is synonymous with a real faith in God. The Christian spirit will find its own methods, and these will vary according to the constitution of the individual or national mind; but if the spirit is truly Christian and reveals the same worshipful attitude as Jesus showed towards justice, truth, righteousness, and peace, which spring from "goodwill among men," it will transcend in influence any effect, whether good or bad, that the method adopted might work. The Christian spirit sheds a divine illumination through the crudest methods, and sends forth a contagious influence for good. It is that, and that alone, which will eventually abolish such evils as war.

Here is a question for those dogmatists who declare that all war must be anti-Christian. "Which was the more Christ-like at the time of the Bulgarian and Armenian atrocities, the warlike attitude of the peace-loving, anti-Jingo statesman Gladstone, who advocated 'packing the unspeakable Turk bag and baggage out of Europe,' or the so-called 'peaceable' attitude of those capitalists who were so much concerned about the value of Turkish bonds in case of the outbreak of war?" Dogmatic Christianity of any kind becomes mechanical, but spiritual Christianity is creative, and will adapt itself to all circumstances, and yet maintain its essential character. Is it not the undue emphasis of dogmatic at the expense of spiritual religion among the churches of Christendom that is responsible for the conditions which made this war possible? The Christian Church, by holding to its idolised creeds and methods, had lost its power. Alfred Noyes, in 'King Albert's Book,' writes:—

For Europe, if it held a creed,
Held it through custom, not through faith.

Chaos returned, in dream and deed.

Right was a legend; Love—a wraith;
And that from which the world began
Was less than even the best in man.

Christendom had lost its convictions. And conviction gone, spiritual guidance is at an end. The only true antidote for the evil in the world is the Christ spirit, and if the churches had devoted their time and energies to spreading and upholding that spirit instead of wasting their strength in propagating doctrines, we should not now be paying the penalty by having to resort to force to save the world again from barbarism.

If, however, the churches recognise their failure, and the cause of it, and resolve henceforth to put their theories—theological and otherwise—into a secondary position, making its first duty to unite in an effort to redeem the world by the spirit of Christ, then the war will have brought some good and "the kingdom of God on earth" drawn appreciably nearer to realisation.—Yours, &c.

CHRISTIANITY AND WAR.

SIR,—Many opinions have been expressed relative to the cause (or causes) of the present European struggle. But any attempts to foist the ultimate responsibility on any one man or people are surely impotent and vain. War (and this War in particular), is the logical and unescapable result of the basis of social existence, as at present constituted. That basis is private property. While men are admitted to the various privileges of society by virtue of what they happen to possess, and not in proportion to their service to the common good, it is natural and inevitable that the individual (and hence the nation), should strive to acquire and dominate as much personal wealth as he can, as the sine qua non for all that renders life desirable and dear. As an obvious consequence, we witness the ruthless struggle between man and man euphoniously styled competition and trade, with luxury and unnecessary riches on the one hand, and squalor, poverty, and the sweating system on the other. While this idea is regnant war is unavoidable. As man competes with man, so people competes with people. One business man does not arbitrate with another, not, at least, if he thinks himself strong enough to crush his rival. On the same principle nations go to war. On the same principle this War (fundamentally, a business struggle), is being waged. Jesus went to the root of the question in his teaching anent the kingdom of God, which, as is not sufficiently emphasised, was to supersede the effete and evil civilisation of that day, and become enthroned on a glorified earth. What was the key to power and privilege in Jesus's day? Private wealth. That was the basis of society then as now. Our Lord declared that great riches, far from being helpful, would positively hinder those who desired to enter the kingdom. What, then, was to be the basis of that glorious regenerated society called the kingdom of God? We cannot read the New Testament long without discovering what it is. It is personal service. He who serves humanity most fully, most deeply, most truly shall be greatest in the kingdom of God. Every society must obviously have some test for those who claim admittance to its prerogatives. It cannot allow all alike the advantages of housing, feeding, clothing, culture, &c. There must be various degrees. We have erected the idol of wealth (in its various and changeful forms), which is cold, unmoral, and soulless, whereby to judge our fellow men. He who has no money must perish, be he a St. Francis or a Savonarola. The test that Jesus would have imposed was the test of service. The benefits that the individual, through the utilisation of his highest gifts, was able and willing to confer upon humanity, would have been the measure of his reward. Until we substitute the beautiful ideal of Christ as the basis of our social life for modern competitive civilisation (!) sin and poverty and woe will reign supreme, and warfare will not cease upon the earth. THE FUTURE OF ARMAMENTS.

SIR,—Briefly, in reply to Mr. Connell, I would say that we need not spin so fine upon a single phrase committing us to this or that, but take as the interpretation of the Sermon on the Mount the whole life and spirit of Jesus and the spirit and conduct of the early Christians, which were for Non-resistance. As for the police force being an organised resistance to evil, we are slowly learning by the faithful preaching of Christian principles that it may, and should, be used to overcome evil with good; we are, indeed, practising them in the improved methods of dealing with crime, in which we recognise that law's processes should not be harsh and vindictive to punish, but the means to reclaim and reform the offender.

I believe that though it may be at present not easy under our conditions of Society to carry out the teaching of Christ, it is the duty of ministers and all Christians to teach it. It is a high ideal, but we are here to point to high ideals and endeavour to reach them, whilst at the same time we try to reform Society, as Jesus did. Statesmen will meantime muddle along through their maze of secret diplomacy and consequent war. There was no need to decry Non-resistance, and I take it that in the third alternative—with which I agree—of an international police, under the control of an international Court of Justice, it would be a real police force, and not an organised resistance to evil; not an army menaced with provocative armaments, replying with scornful and passionate reprisals, but through which armed resistance would be prevented by the Court of Justice bringing the aggrieved parties together to discuss their grievances and come to a settlement before, not after, possible war.—Yours, &c.

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

SIR,—May I venture, as one of the "common herd," to protest against the final decision of the Committee of the National Conference not to hold the meeting this year. I have waited, hoping other more influential members of our Churches would give expression to the desire that, in spite of the war, the meetings (even if in a simplified form) should be held. After Mr. Lupton's letter in your issue of January 23, and also the Resolution passed by the "Ministers of Warwickshire and Neighbouring Counties" in the same issue, I hoped at its meeting on January 27 the National Conference Committee would rescind its original Resolution. Personally, it seems to me that to abandon a religious gathering of earnest men and women at a time of stress like this is a grave mistake. We need the help and inspiration and strength which such gatherings invariably bring more than ever just now.

Though we are all, probably, busier than ever in our lives before, a break such as this would be would come as a welcome rest and refreshment, taking our minds for a time away from the daily stress and strain of life into the higher realms of thought and high endeavour, and sending us all back to work refreshed and invigorated. It seems to me almost a confession of weakness, or "want of faith," for us to say such a gathering would not be any use just now. After all, the other Free Churches are holding their meetings as usual, and the Inter-denominational Social Service Meeting at Swanwick is to be held as usual this June. Have we of the "Liberal Faith" no word of help, no message of comfort, to give our people to help them through these dark days? Surely if ever we need our religious teachers and leaders to give us an inspiring word, we need them now. I very earnestly hope others may feel as I do, and as I have ventured to make my hopes known, that they may do the same before it is absolutely too late for the National Conference Committee to reconsider their "Reconsidered Resolution."—Yours, &c.

A POINT OF HISTORY.

SIR,—Lest your remarks upon the article on the Free Churches in a recent issue of The Manchester Guardian should mislead those unacquainted with the book noticed therein, with your permission I beg leave to offer two comments on the statements in the article singled out for censure: (1) Manchester New College left Manchester in 1853 partly "because of the better education for undergraduate students at University College," and partly because of the provision of religious instruction at Owens College. The managers of the College had not much faith in the future of "Owens," and greatly disliked the introduction in the new institution of divinity teaching. The expression to which you take exception in the article is obviously hyperbolic, like the term "ludicrous" in your criticism of it. (2) That Dr. Martineau frankly ranged himself with the opposition to the movement for establishing domestic missions is a regrettable misunderstanding of the discussion of this movement, due to the writer's confusion of domestic missions with Unitarian missionary activities amongst the artisan and working classes. In the History of the Unitarian Home Missionary College the two are, of course, distinguished. Of the former, Dr. Martineau was an earnest supporter; with the latter he had little or no sympathy.—Yours, &c.,

H. McLACHLAN.

[A review of Mr. McLachlan's book will appear shortly in our columns. Meanwhile, we must dissociate ourselves from his account of the reasons which led to the removal of Manchester New College to London in 1853. It appears to us to be marred by false emphasis, and is likely to produce a misleading impression upon minds which have no knowledge of the subject from other sources. Certainly the writer in The Manchester Guardian has blundered badly.—ED. of INQ.]

FOR THE CHILDREN.

THE STORY OF GARIBALDI.

IV.

THE ADVENTURE OF THE THOUSAND.

AN exile from his native land, Garibaldi had now to get his daily bread. In Morocco, whither he had escaped, he kept himself with his line and gun, making his own sails and fishing-tackle. His only companion was his dog, Castor, whom he loved fondly, and who died of grief when he left. For days together they lived in the wilds on the game he shot; sleeping at night, hunter and dog, under the magnificent olive trees. Sad at heart for his country's sake, he next crossed the Atlantic, and made candles and carried up tubs of tallow at a small candle factory in New York. His occupation was at least emblematic of one who brought the light of liberty and joy into so many lives. But longing for more congenial work, Garibaldi, the most heroic figure of the nineteenth century, might have been seen on the wharves seeking employment as a common sailor or dock labourer, and seeking in vain. Happier times, however, were in sight. He became captain of an old ship, the Carmen, and sailed from Callao with a cargo for China on a year's voyage. The stern and spacious life of the sailor faced by all the perils of the ocean kept both soul and body fit for the great adventures of the future. Nevertheless, across the wilderness of waters he still heard the cry of an oppressed people. "I thought distance could diminish the bitterness of the soul," he wrote to a friend, "but, unfortunately, it is not true. I am athirst for the emancipation of our country." His only terror, he said, was "the likely prospect of never again wielding sword or musket for Italy." In course of time he reached England in command of the Commonwealth, and when the miners of Newcastle heard that he was coming in his ship to fetch away a cargo of their coals, they put their pennies together and bought him a sword of honour.

Garibaldi found himself presently in a position to settle for a while, his children once more with him, on the romantic rock of Caprera, off the coast of Sardinia. But not for long. Ten years had passed when, as he had foretold, Italy's hour would strike, and he would be wanted again. The Piedmontese arose, and with the help of the French drove the Austrians out of Lombardy. Garibaldi fought gallantly in the Alps above Lake Como, and in doing so trained to his command a body of volunteers, by whose help, a few months later, he carried through the crowning achievement of his brilliant career.

At this time Southern Italy and Sicily together formed the Kingdom of Naples, which groaned under the execrable rule of Ferdinand II., known ever since by his nickname, "Bomba," because, like a later sovereign of evil repute, he set his soldiery to bombard the homes of innocent and helpless people. Over 20,000 of his subjects had he flung into his fetid dungeons for no other crime than having better thoughts than he. Men of the most stately and noble character were tortured and put to death. It happened that Mr. Gladstone was visiting Naples, and being amongst the spectators in the court-house, was moved to wrath to hear the wicked judges and false witnesses bringing good men to ruin. But the Liberator was at hand.

On a glorious night in May, 1860, "lit up," as the poet-warrior writes, "with the fire of a thousand lamps with which the Omnipotent has adorned the Infinite," he embarked at Genoa with his thousand "young veterans" ready to follow him anywhere. By some mischance the ammunition did not arrive in time, and the expedition had to sail for the Conquest of Sicily without powder or shot. It was not safe to wait. Ever ready to deal with emergencies, Garibaldi gave orders to sail for the coast of Tuscany, where he surprised the governor of a fort and compelled him to surrender his magazine. Thus replenished, Garibaldi re-embarked, and with a heart overflowing with joy at the prospect of danger composed a hymn of battle on the voyage.

The landing in Sicily was effected safely in spite of the Neapolitan fleet; but a fierce encounter on land soon followed. "Here we make Italy or die," cried Garibaldi, as he led his men up the mountain side against the enemy above. The brave little army, some in red shirts, most without, and soon all in rags, was made up of lawyers, artists, merchants, students, and working-men, and included no less than a hundred doctors who joined in the fighting and attended the wounded afterwards. Most of the 24,000 regular troops who held Sicily for Bomba were in Palermo, the capital, which is built on a beautiful plain called the Golden Shell (Conca d'Oro), facing the sea, and embraced by mountains. Descending from these by night, with his star Areturus shining victory over the city, Garibaldi on his white horse hurled his men into Palermo, and roused the people to join in the street fighting. In order to excite confidence the "Captain of the People" would sit giving his orders on the steps of a great fountain in the public square, amid heaps of fruit and flowers brought by the grateful citizens, and with shells specially directed bursting around but leaving him unscathed. After three days the capital was won, and the great garri-son allowed to make good its flight by way of the fleet. Unknown to the enemy, the ammunition of the Garibaldians was exhausted. Thus Sicily was delivered from the sceptre of a tyrant.

THE DECLINE IN CHURCH ATTENDANCE.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE REPORT ON PUBLIC WORSHIP.

THE following is a summary of the Report on the Attendance at Public Worship which was presented to the recent meeting of the Committee of the National Conference of Unitarian and other Liberal Christian Churches.

Eight hundred and fifty copies of a Circular and Questions relating to Public Worship were sent out to ministers, secretaries of congregations, and other representative persons, and 257 replies were received. From the statistical point of view the Returns probably give the truest and fullest account of the condition of our Churches as yet obtained. In seventy cases "no change" is reported during the last twenty-five years, except in a considerable number of instances where the membership has been maintained while attendance has diminished. In sixty-nine cases the membership has increased. In half a dozen of these cases the increase has been considerable, but the great majority report the increase as "slight." One hundred and fifteen churches report a decrease both of membership and attendance. In a few instances the decrease amounts to 70 or 80 per cent. The average appears to be from about 20 to 30 per cent.

CAUSES OF DECLINE.

Various and conflicting reasons are given for this decline, but there seems to be more general agreement as to the following points:—

- (1) The growth of religious indifference and of the eager seeking after pleasure.
- (2) The more liberal spirit pervading Orthodox Churches, which enables many to remain in them, who otherwise might join our ranks.
- (3) The increasing distance in large towns (often without the help of Sunday trams for, at least, part of the day) between our places of worship and the homes of the congregation.
- (4) The greater mobility of the population in search of careers and employment.
- (5) Business and the struggle of life are said to be more keen, entailing greater need of relaxation.

The replies are practically unanimous with regard to the inadequate training of the young, both of our Sunday Schools and of our families. Nearly every writer urges that much more attention should be paid to securing skilled teaching of religion, and many urge the holding of Confirmation or Dedication Services, by which the young should pass up, as a matter of course, to Church Membership. It is suggested by not a few that the art of teaching should be a distinct part of the curricula of our colleges, so that ministers may not only themselves be efficient teachers, but also be able to train their helpers in the schools in the art of teaching. Sunday Schools must be adapted to modern methods—better equipped, better supported, and above all, made more interesting and attractive. One correspondent, who has had special opportunities of observing all denominations, goes so far as to say that it is more important to look after children than "grown-ups," to pay teachers than preachers. Many replies also lay stress on the neglect of religious training in the home as having much to do with the weak attachment to and easy alienation from the Church on the part of the young.

DEFECTS IN THE MINISTRY.

A large amount of criticism is offered by laymen on the minister and his preaching. Many generous acknowledgments are made of the minister's sincerity, earnestness, ability, industry; but there are also complaints (1) that the young minister comes out of college very ill-prepared for his work, and (2) that the type of preaching among us is too vague, too much in the air, too academic. The criticisms are chiefly (1) that the training has too little relation to the actual work of the ministry and to the conditions of life and thought in the modern world; (2) That in spite of Tate Lectureships, not enough attention is given to turning out acceptable preachers; (3) That students learn nothing at college of the art of teaching, or of Sunday School management; (4) That they are often ignorant of those common elements of science with which every educated man is supposed to be familiar.

To turn from the colleges to the ministers themselves, the most frequent complaint is of the vagueness of their pulpit utterances. The preacher is a messenger, and a messenger implies a message. The sermon too often aims at nothing in particular. It is too abstract, or it deals with subjects in which the hearers have no interest. One correspondent speaks of a sermon he heard on Kant's 'Theories of Space and Time,' addressed to a congregation of twenty working people. Another laments that sermons too often have no personal appeal from heart to heart, while a great many express a strong conviction that what is wanted in the pulpit is more simple religion, a little less intellectualism and technical philosophy, and a good deal more spiritual force.

With regard to Pastoral Visiting, there appears to be a general, but not unanimous belief in its great value. One minister who has been specially successful declares his confidence in "intensive culture," while another expresses the same thought in saying that ministers should give themselves to their ministry, and "do their own work instead of trying to do that of everyone else."

GENERAL CONCLUSIONS.

It needs hardly to be pointed out that while the diminution in Church membership and attendance is not so large and widespread as many feared, it is large enough for the most serious consideration. We are scarcely holding our own, and are far from keeping pace with the growing population.

It would also appear that our supreme need is a revival of simple, earnest, spiritual religion. All else would come right were this accomplished. The Committee, therefore, concur with many of the correspondents in the necessity of emphasising as the fundamental purpose of the Church, the Worship of God, and the Development of the Religious Life. It may, of course, serve other purposes also—e.g., as a Teacher of Truth, a Centre of Social Life, an Organiser of Philanthropy. But these, important as they are, are still secondary, varying with circumstances, while the other objects are primary, essential, unchanging. If maintained in their true dignity, they will keep the minister in mind of his unique vocation; they will also supply what is said sometimes to be sadly lacking in business connected with the Church—a sense of responsibility for the efficient and punctual fulfilment of duties undertaken.

Further, it would appear from the replies of several correspondents that there is need to emphasize the importance of the Church idea—that of a fellowship of living souls bound into an organic whole by a common spiritual consciousness. In some cases it would appear that the congregation is thought of as an audience rather than a Church. Membership of a Church means, or should mean, much more than the payment of a subscription, namely, sharing in a larger moral and spiritual life than that of the solitary soul, and honouring the demands of "the Beloved Community" by a service, a loyalty, and a devoted chivalry akin to, and as great as that of the citizen to his country.

RECOMMENDATIONS.

The Committee conclude with the following recommendations:—

- (1) That Ministers be encouraged to hold classes for children of members of the congregation—especially when these do not attend the Sunday School.
- (2) That Dedication or Confirmation Services be held for young persons of 16 and upwards as they enter on a more responsible period of life. Such a service should be preceded by a Preparation Class conducted by the Minister, extending over, say, three months, dealing with the fundamental realities of religion, and with our special history and the claims and privileges of our Church life.
- (3) That a small Committee be appointed to prepare a Form of Confirmation Service, with a view of making it as impressive as possible (firstly) to the young people actually participating; (secondly), to the congregation as a whole, whose sympathy would be assured and most welcome. The Communion Service on the same day, or shortly afterwards, would be a very appropriate sequel in places where that service is observed.

- (4) That some of our Senior Ministers should be understood to be willing to conduct such services, if and when requested.
- (5) That Congregations be urged to enable young people to become junior or associate members of their Churches after Confirmation.
- (6) That the authorities of the colleges be requested urgently to consider such modifications in the training of students as may help them more effectively in their future careers, especially as regards :—
- (a) Sunday School Organisation, the Psychology of the Child, and especially the Art of Teaching.
- (b) The Preparation for and Conducting of Public Worship, and the occasional Religious Services of the Church.
- (c) The Discharge of Pastoral Duties.

[NOTE.—The Committee may wish to submit further Recommendations before the Triennial Meetings of the Conference. But they consider those given above are so important that no time should be lost in giving effect to them, as they are specially opportune at the present crisis.]

SOUTHERN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE Annual Meeting of this Association was held in the Church of the Saviour, Southampton, on Wednesday, February 3, the President, the Rev. H. S. Solly, in the chair. Both the report and the attendance at the meeting bore marks of the stress of the time. Having referred to the great cloud of the war, which had fallen upon our churches as upon the rest of the country, the report said: "It was impossible that this should leave their work unaffected, and we have to recognise the fact that in many cases normal activities have been suspended or have suffered through the absence of workers, and attendance at services has also been proportionately less. At the same time it must be recognised that our people have faced the duties of the hour with determined purpose, and much service has been rendered for the relief of suffering and in other helpful ways." In the direction of extended missionary work an effort had once more been made at Eastleigh, where the Rev. G. W. Thompson of Portsmouth had conducted a number of week-evening open-air meetings, but hitherto it had been impossible to find any room for meetings during the winter. At Poole and Wareham an increase was reported in the Sunday School. At St. Thomas's Street, Portsmouth, the Church building had been renovated, and at Bournemouth the design of the Church had been completed by the erection of a tower, with the distinct gain of greater prominence in the public view. The tower was the gift of a generous friend, to whom the congregation has been for years deeply indebted, but who in this matter insisted in remaining anonymous. Reference was made with great regret to the retirement of the Rev. A. R.

Andreae, for reasons of health, from the pulpit at Southampton. "He has added strength to our counsels," the report said, "and a delightful element to the fellowship of the ministry. It is matter for sincere congratulation that he is to be still resident in the district, and that the bonds of cordial friendship may remain unbroken." After reference to the losses sustained through the death of the Rev. Alfred Hood, first minister of the Bournemouth congregation, Mrs. Ruddle of Newport, and Mrs. Smith, for twenty-five years the widow of the late Rev. J. W. Smith, of Ringwood, the report concluded: "Out of the sorrow inevitable to such partings, and the yet deeper tragedy of suffering and sorrow brought upon the whole world by the war, we must find the way to a more perfect spirit of surrender and a more determined faithfulness of service. For truth and righteousness and honour, in simple-hearted loyalty to the Highest, ready and fearless in self-sacrifice, we desire to stand together and do our part in this great conflict. There may be for a time a certain weakening or hindering of the accustomed work of our Churches, yet surely only that we may be doing other necessary things, and meeting the more immediate claims of the hour; and at the same time, with a deeper consecration in the prayer and aspiration of our common worship, in closer bonds of human sympathy, and with faith unshaken in the need of our testimony and the service that our Churches may render, as homes of the spirit, as ministering to all human needs, and serving the great cause of the Kingdom of God on earth."

Mrs. Cogan Conway, of Ringwood, was elected President for the ensuing year, Mr. Solly one of the Vice-Presidents, and the other officers were re-elected. On the motion of the Rev. W. B. Matthews a cordial vote of thanks was passed to the lay-preachers of the district. A resolution, in the sense of the reference of the report to the retirement of the Rev. A. R. Andreae, was also passed, and a vote of thanks to the President brought the meeting to a close.

WE beg to draw attention to the Special Service, to be conducted by the Rev. Joseph Wood, which will be held next Sunday, 14th inst., at 3.15 P.M. at University Hall, Gordon Square. In the United States all the Unitarian Sunday Schools are setting apart the 14th of February for a general commemoration of the hundred years' peace between England and the United States. The Committee of the Portland Sunday School have arranged the above Service in order that their scholars may unite in this commemoration. The letters which have been exchanged between the English and American Sunday School Associations will be read and appropriate peace hymns will be sung. Scholars of neighbouring Sunday Schools have been invited to be present, and it is hoped that older members of the congregations will also attend. A commemorative card will be given to every scholar present.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

London: Brixton.—On Friday, February 5, a Meeting was held in the Schoolroom attached to Effra Road Church to welcome the Rev. G. Maurice Elliott as minister of the congregation. Mr. Elliott has been settled at Brixton, with the status of a lay-worker, for more than a year, but has now qualified as a full minister. The chair was taken by Dr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., who was supported on the platform by several London ministers, including the Rev. Gilbert Sadler, of Wimbledon Congregational Church. A hearty welcome on behalf of the congregation was given by the chairman, Mr. Terry. The Rev. W. G. Tarrant, speaking on behalf of the ministers of the neighbourhood, referred to the deep grounds of confidence which were to be found in religion at a time like the present. He expressed his pleasure that Mr. Elliott was working so effectively among the young. The Rev. D. W. Robson, of Peckham, spoke as a fellow-student of Mr. Elliott's at Hackney College, and brought the testimonial of his fellow-students to his good qualities, which they had all learnt to value highly. The Rev. Gilbert Sadler, referring to the fact that several Congregational ministers had seceded lately in order to take charge of Unitarian churches, said that he felt ashamed that Congregationalism had not been big enough to keep them. A great many of the younger men had outgrown the narrowness of the system which obtains in Congregationalism to-day. In regard to the spiritual needs of the churches, he expressed his own strong feeling that the civilised world was waiting for a deeper and richer realisation of God. The churches had not captured the world because their notion of God was that of a cold, complete Creator living alone in an eternity of his own. But they were discovering a more dynamic idea of God. He was a power who works. His creation was unfinished. He was always doing it, and He was doing it through human souls. This, in so far as they realised it, was something which would win the world, for what the world really wanted was a living Saviour-God, who bears our sins and suffers with us. Why, he asked, should not all "isms" become groups who realised in their life this Saviour-God? When they were one in this way, then the world would believe. The Rev. H. Gow expressed some friendly dissent from Mr. Sadler's position. He referred to the need of the intellectual love of God and to a real difference between human and divine suffering. He believed, too, that the challenge of the war was going to make men, not less, but more intellectual. They would get away from hazy, easy opinions, and go back to the real problems, which require strong and sincere thinking. In this time of national anxiety they must, as religious men, stand for the value of the inward life. It was for those of them who had to stay at home to suffer and to toil, in order to make religion a living thing. He believed that it was a great time for a man to begin his ministry. After further words of welcome by the Revs. W. C. Bowie and J. A. Pearson, Mr. Elliott replied, and dwelt specially upon the need for free, frank, and honest speech. Men found this sort of thing in Brotherhood meetings, but they must also find it in the church. Too many men were taught in orthodox theological colleges to preach the opinions of their professors. They were urged, first of all, to preach the truth until they believed it, and only in the second place because they believed it. That was not possible in Unitarian Christianity, and it was one of the things which had attracted him. Thanking them all very cordially for the kindness and warmth of the welcome, he said that his chief aim would be to build up a spiritual church which should be a true reflection of the mind of Christ.

London: Forest Gate.—The annual meeting of the Unitarian Church, Upton Lane, was held on Saturday, January 30. The reports showed that, in spite of the difficulties of the past year, there had been some increase in the membership and the evening attendance, so that the pioneer preachers in charge, Mr. F. G. Barrett Ayres and Mr. J. Begg, have begun the new year with considerable encouragement. The excellent institutional work carried on under their direction, and that of Sister Knight and Sister Seymour, also promises well for the future. A musical programme was kindly provided by the members of the Ilford Unitarian Church Orchestra, including the Rev. A. H. Biggs.

London: Hackney.—On Tuesday evening, February 9, at 8.15, the first of a course of lectures on 'Aspects of the War' was given in Aspland Hall, adjoining the New Gravel Pit Church, by Prof. F. F. Urquhart, who took for his subject 'The Causes of the War.' On February 16 the subject will be 'Empire and War,' lecturer Mr. C. W. Arnett; February 23, 'A League of Peace,' Mr. G. Lowes Dickinson; March 2, 'The Serbian Campaign,' Dr. R. W. Seton Watson; and on March 9, 'How British Pluck Won Through in France,' Mr. A. H. Jessel, K.C. Among those who have consented to take the chair are Sir Albert Spicer and Mr. C. Roden Buxton. Mr. Arnett's and Mr. Jessel's lectures will be illustrated by lantern slides. Each lecture will be followed by a discussion, and collections will be taken for the Prince of Wales's National Relief Fund. Tickets can be obtained from Mr. W. H. Parker, 160, Brooke Road, Stoke Newington, N.

London: Islington.—We are informed that the Rev. Dr. Tudor Jones has resigned his position as minister of Unity Church, Islington. His resignation will take effect in the summer.

Tenterden.—The Annual Meeting of the Sunday School in connection with the Old Meeting House was held on Wednesday, February 3. In the absence of the minister through indisposition, Mr. J. E. Mace, J.P., presided. The prizes were distributed by Mrs. R. C. Dendy. The number of prizes was smaller than usual. The elder scholars have elected that the value of their prizes shall be given to Mrs. Bernard Allen's Belgian Hospital Fund.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

WAR AS TEMPERANCE REFORMER.

A deadly blow has been struck at the drink curse in France by the publication of a decree prohibiting the sale of absinthe and kindred liquors—whether wholesale or retail—as also the opening of fresh houses for the sale of alcoholic liquors and spirits. At the beginning of the War the Minister of the Interior sent a circular note to the Prefects of Departments "inviting" them to suppress "by order" the sale of, and traffic in, absinthe and kindred liquors. Such orders could only have effect during the war. The new decrees have a final character, as Parliament will be asked to ratify them. Thus the "green fiend" which social reformers unanimously regard as their most insidious and dangerous enemy in the struggle against the forces which undermine the nation's health and vigour is now doomed. Temperance advocates have repeatedly tried to prevail on Parliament to adopt such a measure, but the opposition of "the trade" has been too strong. Absinthe has already been officially banned in three other countries—Belgium, Holland, and Switzerland. Belgium (though few of her people had developed the absinthe habit) forbade the sale of the liquor as a preventive measure in 1905, Switzerland following suit in 1908, and Holland in 1910.

THE SOCIETY FOR INTERNATIONAL RIGHT.

Several new societies have already been formed for the purpose of dealing with the grave problems arising out of the War, and still another, the Society for International Right, must be added to the list. This Society has been formed in order to educate public opinion on strictly non-party and non-sectarian lines, with a view to ensuring the respect for treaties and the security of small nations on which our hopes of a permanent peace must be based. Its objects are twofold: 1. Both during and after the War to promote a right understanding of international relations; to teach that, in their moral, social, economic, and intellectual aspects those relations are co-operative and not antagonistic, and are not based on physical force. Nations must discard the appeal to force to settle disputes as individuals have discarded it. 2. During the War, to create a demand, based on the above teaching, that a just peace shall conclude the War, a peace that shall respect the claims of nationality and set up a tribunal to settle disputes by reason and not by recourse to arms. The Society asks for support in personal service and financial aid in order to carry on and extend its work in the British Empire, and to get into touch with similar organisations in other countries. Among the Vice-Presidents are M. Le Senateur Lafontaine, Canon Grane, and Mrs. H. M. Swanwick. Further information can be obtained from the Secretary, Miss E. B. Abrahams, 47, Victoria Street, S.W.

DR. CROOKER ON TEMPERANCE.

Among many other activities, Dr. J. H. Crooker has found time to bring together all the aspects of the temperance question in his closely packed book, 'Shall I Drink?' His many friends on this side the Atlantic will congratulate him on the accomplishment of so considerable a task. The pictures, charts, and diagrams are most eloquent and convincing, and every science seems to have been consulted as to its bearing on the question. The political side of the subject is well handled. The book will form a splendid store of suggestions and references for speakers upon the subject. If this wholehearted presentation of the matter may be taken for the view of our American churches, it is an important sign of the times. On the dedication page (to the students of Wisconsin and Michigan Universities) Dr. Crooker says that if he were a college student he would dedicate himself to this cause, "to stop the use of Drink."

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.

WE have had another good week with our Belgian Hospital Fund. It will be seen that it has now reached £1,000—it is well over that amount if we include promises not yet paid in—in addition to the large amount of clothing. But it is all being rapidly absorbed. On Thursday a consignment of 3,000 garments and £200-worth of hospital requisites left London, and there is every reason to believe that the work of distribution will have begun by the time these words are in the hands of our readers.

WE have had some interesting inquiries about the possibility of sending out nurses, and one generous promise of help. The plan is being carefully considered in all its details. We are having inquiries made in the hospitals in regard to their actual needs, and the Belgian medical authorities are being consulted. We hope shortly to be able to announce that the way is quite clear for us to organise help in this direction. Meanwhile we shall be glad to receive conditional promises in addition to the help given to the ordinary work of the Fund, which grows in its possibility of usefulness every week. Two friends have sent us promises of monthly subscriptions. May we commend this excellent example to others? It is a practical recognition that the need cannot be met by one big splash, but will require a constant stream of help.

* * *

THE two letters of thanks which we publish this week are evidence of the lively gratitude with which our gifts have been received. At the same time, they will help many donors to realise the pleasant human side of the scheme. We can almost overhear the approval and delight of the patients themselves. Assurances reach us from people who have an intimate acquaintance with the whole situation that no form of human service is more needed at the present moment than the one to which we have set our hands. It will help our readers to realise the scarcity of the most elementary requisites which exists in some of these hospitals, when we mention that we have had to supply a large quantity of kitchen utensils. One hospital asked for crutches and some strong walking-sticks, that the wounded men might be able to hobble about. Of course these have been sent. Some minor comforts have also not been forgotten, like writing-paper and packs of cards. As a last item of news for this week, we may mention that we have been able to place a good deal of work in War workrooms, so as to help our own women who are out of employment.

SIR JOHN FRENCH is a master of short sentences. His last dispatch, which appeared on Wednesday, contains enough material to supply most journalists with copy for a month. The business-like description of military operations is followed by a tribute to the quality of the fighting force under his command, which by its very manner inspires the reader with confidence that he means exactly what he says. What higher praise could any army desire to receive from its commander than is contained in the following passage?

The troops composing the army in France have been subjected to as severe a trial as it is possible to impose upon any body of men. The desperate fighting described in my last dispatch had hardly been brought to a conclusion when they were called upon to face the rigours and hardships of a winter campaign. Frost and snow have alternated with periods of continuous rain.

The men have been called upon to stand for many hours together almost up to their waists in bitterly cold water, only separated by one or two hundred yards from a most vigilant enemy.

Although every measure which science and medical knowledge could suggest to mitigate these hardships was employed, the sufferings of the men have been very great.

In spite of all this they presented, at the inspections to which I have referred, a most soldier-like, splendid, though somewhat war-worn appearance. Their spirit remains high and confident; their general health is excellent, and their condition most satisfactory.

I regard it as most unfortunate that circumstances have prevented any account of many splendid instances of courage and endurance, in the face of almost unparalleled hardship and fatigue in war, coming regularly to the knowledge of the public.

SIR JOHN FRENCH also pays a warm tribute of praise to the clergy—"in a quiet and unostentatious manner the chaplains of all denominations have worked with devotion and energy in their respective spheres"; and to the Medical Service—"since the commencement of hostilities the work of the Royal Army Medical Corps has been carried out with untiring zeal, skill, and devotion." But it is probably his unstinted praise of the Territorial Force which will give the greatest pleasure.

I and the principal Commanders serving under me [he says] consider that the Territorial Force has far more than justified the most sanguine hopes that any of us ventured to entertain of their value and use in the field... Army Corps Commanders are loud in their praise of the Territorial Battalions which form part of nearly all the brigades at the front in the first line, and more than one of them have told me that these battalions are fast approaching—if they have not already reached—the standard of efficiency of Regular Infantry.

WE hope that the country will keep its head about the rise in the cost of living. The figures are undoubtedly serious, but the pinch is not so severe as many people feared would be the case at the beginning of the war. We doubt whether a syndicate of all the best brains in the country could devise means which would bring prices down to a normal level at the present time. There must be ceaseless vigilance, and there ought to be economy in the use of food. But it seems to us foolish and useless to go about the world seeking for a scape-goat or to indulge in menacing language towards the Government, as some of the Labour members have done this week, if some particular remedy is not adopted without a moment's delay. If we remember that, after six months of colossal war expenditure and a world-wide dislocation of trade, there is less misery and destitution among our people than we have often had to face on account of industrial disputes, we shall begin to see things in their true proportion.

IN an article dealing with this subject in The Daily News, Dr. Gilbert Slater pleads that the policy of fixing prices is one which should be viewed with great caution. As an alternative he makes three suggestions: (1) That wages in the badly paid trades ought to rise in accordance with the cost of living. He thinks that closer co-operation between the Government Departments and the trade unions could achieve a good deal in this direction. (2) The Government could offer a bounty on the importation of wheat. (3) He suggests that, if the rise in prices becomes more serious than it is now, disposing people to accept a slight sacrifice in order to prevent a real hardship, breweries and distilleries should be closed down, and the grain ordinarily used for brewing and distilling be used to provide a really cheap British war-bread, which, if not quite equal to wheaten bread, would at least be more nourishing, and probably more palatable, than the German variety. He points out that there would still be a plentiful variety of alcoholic drinks available for those who require them. "There is no suggestion of compulsory teetotalism here, nor need we contemplate the idea of imitating that Russian policy which we have so heartily praised."

FRANCE has decided to follow the Russian policy to the extent of prohibiting the sale of absinthe. This had been adopted already for the duration of the war, but last week the Chamber of Deputies adopted by 481 votes to 52 the Bill suppressing it altogether. This is a measure of immense importance for the physical and moral well-being of France. Its manhood has had no more deadly foe. Is the war going to do nothing to curb the menace of strong drink in our own country and to break its power?

SEVERAL letters have appeared in the press recently urging that the Allies ought to state the terms which they are prepared to accept if Germany will lay down her arms. "What," they ask, "are we fighting for? Nobody seems to know." This is hardly a fair statement of the case. It is quite true that the objects which we have in view are not so clearly defined as in many conflicts of the past. But the country as a whole is quite aware that we are fighting to overthrow a monstrous conspiracy against civilisation, and to win some adequate measure of protection for the future. We are hardly in a position, at the present stage of the war, to state with any clearness how these ends are to be secured when the conflict is transferred from the battlefield to the council chamber. Much will depend upon the military situation and the temper of the German people. The idealists who lay down general principles and talk vaguely about "a war to end war" often overlook the vast and intricate web of political detail which will have to be discussed in the terms of peace, not by them, but by the practical statesmen of Europe. Many of the arrangements will not conform to any preconceived plan. All that we can fairly demand is that they shall not be of a kind to hinder the slow growth of national life in freedom and justice, or leave Europe so fully exposed as it has been in the past to hostile attack.

THE death of Canon Cheyne removes a scholar to whom the enlightened study of theology is deeply indebted. He was one of the pioneers of Old Testament criticism in this country, combining minute textual learning with literary insight. His active and inquisitive mind threw off the trammels of ecclesiastical tradition with a thoroughness which often startled his Oxford friends, and this gave an element of freshness and originality to much of his work. In later years this independence of mind grew upon him, and led to a series of works which were marked, in the opinion of many competent judges, more by individual daring than by soundness of judgment. No doubt this lack of balance was the cause of a certain amount of public indifference; but dissent from much that seemed almost like self-delusion in his later critical work should only throw into stronger relief the excellence of his earlier studies of Isaiah, the Psalms, Job and Solomon, and much of the work which he put into the 'Encyclopædia Biblica.' But a greater thing than his scholarship was the teacher himself. He was a man of deep personal piety, and through a long illness, which would have fettered the activities and dulled the spirit of most men, he continued to press forward into new paths of inquiry with indomitable courage and cheerfulness.

* * *

WE publish to-day an appeal from the Sunday School Association to young people. It is a request made especially to the scholars of our Sunday Schools for a united gift. The gift will cost £500, and it is to take the form of a field ambulance for wounded British soldiers at the front. It is not a large sum when it is spread over a wide area, and we hope that it will be secured speedily. It will be all the better if it is a real scholars' offering, raised, not by begging for subscriptions, but by personal gifts from their own money.

"THE IMMORALITY OF NON-RESISTANCE."

THE title is not our own. Its pungent and biting flavour is due to the vivid pen of Mr. Lloyd Thomas. If it is rhetorical, it is a just use of rhetoric; for it sticks in the memory and makes people ask "What does he mean?" as soon as they hear it. Well, what he means is just this, that the people who proclaim non-resistance as the only true Christian teaching, and assume that we cannot take the high redemptive purposes of the Gospel even into the battlefield, are fatally mistaken, and in pursuit of a theory are in danger of becoming accomplices in a crime. He handles the extreme pacifist position not without sympathy and respect; but he is convinced, and it is hardly necessary for us to remind our readers how closely we agree with him, that it has by no means the best of the argument, either from the point of view of abstract reason or of practical Christian morals. People of the Tolstoyan school have been too ready to assume that they have a monopoly of Christianity, and that all who do not agree with their doctrine of quietism are traitors to the religion of the spirit. They will be startled, and possibly hurt, by the vigour with which Mr. Lloyd Thomas states the contrary opinion; but perhaps they will be surprised most of all to discover with what passionate glow of conviction and noble religious feeling the contrary opinion can be held.

Mr. Thomas sees clearly the fallacy of an assumption which colours many discussions on this subject. It is often taken for granted that men are naturally of a good will, that they yield easily to spiritual appeals, and that the quarrels which divide them are due more to intellectual misunderstandings than to moral turpitude. It is seldom that the fact is faced that non-resistance means, in the last resort, surrender to the wicked man, and the denial of human right to make any effectual effort to thwart his designs.

Though we admire the heroism [Mr. Thomas writes], and love the spirit of many of those who hold this doctrine to be of absolute and universal validity, we must not shrink from the painful duty of saying that their moral teaching, in this particular, were it actually put into practice to-day, would plunge all that civilisation has won, through centuries of sacrifice and agony and travail, down into the black night of crime and lust and devilry. The doctrine of Non-Resistance errs in under-estimating the wild and lawless tendencies that are ever threatening to overwhelm the moral achievements of the race. It errs in under-estimating the cold-blooded and calculating malignancy that still clings like a fungus to the heart of cynical man. It errs in imagining that sympathy and tenderness alone can redeem the world, and that God's awful justice needs not the co-operation and intervention of man.

We have no space in which to follow the admirable exposition of the dangers of a slavish literalism in the use of the teaching of Christ, coupled as it is with the warning that we must not expect to get from mere words what they can never give,—“some handy key that will open every lock in the universe, a neat and trim little formula that will reconcile every conflict of duties, solve every problem of conduct, and explain every mystery of existence.” But the following passage, inspired by the conception of a Christian civilisation as something that is still in process of becoming, and based upon the acceptance of the teaching of the Sermon on the Mount “as the purest and sanest verbal expression that eternal life in the midst of time has ever received,” will serve to illustrate the point of view.

Social life is not a homogeneous whole at the same level of spiritual responsibilities, but includes diverse and conflicting stages of ethical sensitiveness and attainment, from savagery to sainthood. The Spirit of Christ is therefore not to be regarded as a catalogue of maxims or a code of laws, rigidly applicable in the same way to different people in varying contexts and complications. We have to ask how, here and now, in the face of this particular man or this particular class, or this particular set of circumstances—how we can best and most perfectly make the Christian spirit prevail, how we can best and most sincerely express the Christian Ideal in the actual concrete tangle of contradictions we call real life.... This does not mean that the sanctity and authority of the Christ-Spirit have broken down, but that its expression and incidence must have regard to the field of its operations, and the nature of the material on which it has to work.

But Mr. Thomas is most eloquent and convincing when he upholds the duty of protecting the weak and defending the moral gains of civilisation against wanton attack. Here he confronts us boldly with the alternative of organising our forces for the preservation of every noble thing that man by painful effort has acquired, or of seeing everything that is pure and lovely and of good report trodden into the dust by the destroyer. He insists that on the plane of this material world, Right must ever enlist the aid of Might. “It is not Right versus Might. It is not Right or Might, as if they were eternally contrary the one to the other. It is Right and Might in strong and holy alliance within the kingdom and for the kingdom.” He admits to the full the need of the Christian temper of patience and forgiveness; we must purge our hearts of all bitterness and evil desire; but when we are face to face with the spiritual claims of humanity, and the duties, whether personal or national, which they impose, this is for him the conclusion of the whole matter:

Where rights and feelings are not mainly a man's own, where he holds them as a trustee on behalf of human Brotherhood, where they are his, mainly or wholly, as the representative and organ of the Moral Order of Society, where they belong, not merely to him as a separate and isolated individual, but rather to the very basis of a Christian fraternity, then he cannot renounce them without sin. To offer no active resistance to their violation and destruction is to be an accomplice in anarchy, and so far from being an act of pity or forbearance, it is really infidelity to the Human Race, apostasy from Christ, and high treason against God.

These are plain and uncompromising words, but they only express, with the ardour of complete conviction, what most religious men accept as a commonplace of decent behaviour. They have upon them no taint of compromise with the evil of the world; but they are also free from the false spirituality which looks upon the use of physical force as unhallowed, and from the moral hesitation which shrinks from a full acceptance of all the conditions of our life upon earth. It is God's will that we should use physical force, when it is the only remedy and we cannot refuse to do so without dishonour or infinite disgrace. It all depends upon the motive. When the motive is noble and pure, without malice and without vindictiveness, then we may dare to say that it is God Himself who places the weapon in our hands for the punishment of evildoers and the defence of them that do well.

Good Thoughts for Ebil Times.

FRANCIS loved to dwell upon the Apostle's words, "Dearly beloved, avenge not yourselves, but rather give place unto wrath." Cannon balls are deadened by sacks of wool, he used to say, though they destroy all the hard substances which they meet. "A soft answer turneth away wrath," as water puts out fire. The Bishop used to say that an angry elephant might be calmed by a little lamb, and that a bear will run away from a cat! Our Dear Lord promised that the meek shall inherit the earth, inasmuch as by their gentleness and kindness they become masters of the hearts of men. Gentle people easily mould themselves to the will of others, and in consequence other men submit more easily to their will.

In all serious cases of misrepresentation Francis taught that the only course is to dwell upon the thought of our Saviour dying a shameful death upon the Cross between two thieves. "Surely a glance at this brazen serpent will serve to heal the wounds which misrepresentation or slander have inflicted. When we look upon that depth of suffering we shall be ashamed to complain, much more to feel any resentment towards our slanderers." —From 'The Spirit of St. Francis de Sales,' by Jean Pierre Camus.

PRAYER.

There is an awful quiet in the air,
And the sad earth, with moist imploring eye,
Looks wide and wakeful at the pondering sky,
Like patience slow subsiding to despair.
But see, the blue smoke, as a voiceless
prayer,
Sole witness of a secret sacrifice,
Unfolds its tardy wreaths, and multiplies
Its soft chameleon breathings in the rare
Capacious ether;—so it fades away,
And nought is seen beneath the pendent blue,
The undistinguishable waste of day.
So have I dreamed—oh, may the dream be true!—
That praying souls are purged from mortal hue,
And grow as pure as he to whom they pray. HARTLEY COLERIDGE.

O GOD, the strength of all those who put their trust in Thee, and by whose care we have been taught how to care: we pray for all those who are striving and suffering in this terrible war; bless our soldiers and sailors, and all who at this time are offering themselves in a spirit of sacrifice for the land they love; be near to all those who are in dangers often, in watchings often, in weariness often; give help to the wounded; recovery, if it be Thy will, to the sick; rest and refreshment to the dead; comfort to the mourners; the peace of trust to all anxious hearts: skill and courage to doctors and nurses: support and guidance to those on whom the burdens of responsibility lie heavily; protection to all poor men, neglected women, forsaken children: visit with Thy merciful judgments the workers and defenders of wrong that they may repent and have their feet turned into the paths of righteousness and peace: remove the spiritual ignorance and unbelief which see in physical force the chief security of nations: bless the peacemakers of every land who live and work in the faith and hope of Jesus Christ; and in Thine own good time put an end to the evil of war and restore to Europe the blessings of a righteous and lasting peace. Let the people praise Thee, O God: let all the people praise Thee. Amen.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

MOTOR AMBULANCE £500 FUND.

SIR,—We shall be glad of an opportunity to make known the following appeal, which has been sent to our Ministers, to the Secretaries of our Churches, and the Superintendents of our Sunday Schools for the children and young people.

"Out there, 'somewhere' in France or Belgium, the men are fighting for our country, always in danger of wounds and sickness. If we were to see one of them struck down, his suffering, his cheerfulness, and his brave patience, would we not run to him and do all that we could to help? Would we not want to carry him away out of the noise to some safe, quiet, clean place to be cared for and made well again? We cannot all go to the front and do that, but we would like to have some share in it, and here is a way.

"We want you all, the teachers and scholars of our 300 Sunday Schools, and the children and young people belonging to the Church, to join in sending a Motor Ambulance as a messenger from you, to show the men that you are thinking of them, and to take part in the work of helping the wounded. The Ambulance will be given to the British Red Cross Society, who will put it in charge of the Military Authorities; but it will still be your Ambulance, and will have on it a plate to say that it is from you.

"One wounded man, writing home, said: 'I have been at the war, but I can truly say also that I have seen heaven, for I have been in hospital.' In order that men may be taken to the base at once, a great many ambulances are urgently needed, and more and more of them are wanted as our army grows bigger. So in giving one, you will be doing a most useful and necessary service.

"The amount needed is £500—that is, £400 for the cost of the Ambulance itself, and £100 towards the expenses of keeping it running backwards and forwards between the firing line and the hospital.

"One word more. Even though you may have to ask the grown-ups to help you, will you give of your own earnings or spending money so that it may be a gift from yourselves? In that way you will turn what you give into tokens of your work and your love."

We feel sure that this appeal will commend itself to every one connected with our Churches and Schools, and that we can rely on the necessary help being given to raise the whole of the Fund. All contributions should be sent to the Hon. Treasurer, Essex Hall, not later than March 23rd.

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

SIR,—It is gratifying to learn from Miss Wolff's vigorous but courteous letter how highly the Triennial Meetings of the Conference are valued. It would be irregular to report the discussions of a Committee, but I can assure Miss Wolff and any who sympathise with her regret, as indeed we all do, that the considerations which she mentions were all taken into account, as well as a good many others with which she could not be acquainted. I may, perhaps, be allowed to say that the Conference Committee does not appoint itself, and that it is widely representative. If my information is correct, there were present at one or other of the meetings which considered the matter more than twice the total number present at the meetings of the two external bodies which have pleaded, quite within their rights, against postponement.

May I remind your readers that the Conference is essentially a representative body? Speaking roughly, two-thirds of its members are chosen after the programme has been issued with which they are to deal, and about which they may have to receive instructions from their constituents. Hitherto the programme has been passed six months before the meetings, and the Report of the Committee three months before the meetings. We are all hoping for the best, and that the final issue of the struggle will be favourable; but when we are told on high authority that in three months the War will have begun, and that what we have been going through since August is merely preliminary, one sees the difficulty of forecasting a programme which will then be suitable, and still more of counting on an attendance which would give weight to any decisions reached.

It has, indeed, been suggested that the meetings might be cut down, perhaps to a single day. Even then it would still be necessary to appoint Delegates, &c., and among those who recommend this solution of the difficulty there is the widest difference of opinion as to which parts of the usual programme should be included or excluded.

Amid our anxieties and disappointments there is at least one great consolation. It is said that our people want "a lead" with regard to the War. But is this really so? I should have thought that, fine as has been the record of our people in the past for citizenship and public spirit, the noblest chapter of all is being written at the present time by the hundreds of our young men who, from no inbred love of naval or military glory and adventure, are offering their lives in the service of their country and of humanity. Of course, they could not attend meetings, and in many cases the necessity of taking their places at business would keep others away. Indeed, speaking generally, it may be said that the people (including our women-kind), without whom the Conference would be foredoomed to failure, are exactly those whose time and thought and means are being taxed, and will be taxed, to the utmost. I must not conclude without acknowledging in the warmest terms the great kindness and consideration shown in the matter by our prospective hosts at Leeds. Though the Committee would not desire to shirk its responsibility, it has naturally wished to act in concert with them.—Yours, &c.

SIR,—At a meeting of ministers of the Liverpool District, held on February 16, the following resolution was unanimously passed:—

"This Meeting of Ministers of Liverpool and District greatly regrets the recent decision of the National Conference Committee to abandon the Conference meetings this year. The Ministers here assembled feel strongly that the Conference will suffer seriously if no meeting at all is held, and earnestly urge that some effort be yet made to hold the Conference, at least in a modified form."

I was asked to forward the above to you, and therefore now do so.—Yours,

FORCE IS NO REMEDY.

SIR,—May I present a few reflections of an ordinary layman upon the command of Jesus to "Resist not evil"? I think a good deal of the difficulty in rightly interpreting this text would disappear if a little more regard than is usual were given to the values of terms. Both "evil" and "resistance" are terms which embrace an infinite variety of qualifications. In the present case, I think the preceding context to the passage justifies the belief that Jesus was dealing with a somewhat limited type of evil, and of resistance also. Is not much of the perplexity arising out of the command due to our attaching a too absolute meaning to the word evil? Is not obedience to the injunction impossible? Jesus virtually says "Don't hit back." The follower in obeying stands up against another voice—which, I should say, was that of the spirit of evil—urging him to hit back. Surely he is, after all, a resister of evil. His non-resistance simply means a refusal to be led by the spirit that bids him retaliate—the same spirit that has prompted his enemy to injure him, and that would now double the sum of evil in the world by inducing him to return injury for injury. In a limited sense he is a non-resister, but in a far deeper and wider sense he is a resister of evil. Only in this way can I reconcile the apparent contradiction involved in the two commands, "Resist not evil" and "Resist the Devil." Striving to gain a true perspective, and to realise the far-reaching significance of the terms "evil" and "resistance," I am disposed to think that Christ's command does not, in certain cases, preclude self-defence, nor any other opposing action against an enemy, so long as such action is not prompted by the spirit of evil, and is the outcome of a desire to fight the evil, and rescue the individual from its baneful power. I should like to take this opportunity of thanking you for your great and sustained efforts to help your readers to clear Christian thinking at this trying time. I am sure that many will gratefully recognise that you are pursuing your task with very special devotion.—Yours, &c.,

INOCULATION FOR TYPHOID.

SIR,—In your paragraph about inoculation you say that, though not competent to express an opinion, you would urge men to be inoculated, on the ground that there is a great deal of evidence in favour of it.

It is one thing to urge them; it is another thing to make it compulsory. I am told that this is done in the German army, with the result that there is an epidemic of typhoid amongst them. If this is the result of compulsory inoculation, while in our army the result of sanitation plus optional inoculation is a remarkable immunity from epidemic disease, it does not seem logical to ascribe this immunity to inoculation. I should rather ascribe it to the care which has been bestowed on sanitation. I have no doubt Sir Almroth Wright honestly believes it to be due to inoculation; but, then, he honestly believes that no woman ought to be a doctor; and I do not see why he should be thought infallible on the one point more than on the other. The matter is one on which doctors differ; and if there is, as you say, much evidence in its favour, there is also evidence against it; and the evidence "needs to be sifted by highly trained minds."

Till this has been done I cannot see that we are justified in making it compulsory, even on future recruits. But to impose it on those who have already enlisted on the understanding that it is not compulsory would, as it seems to me, be not only a most tyrannical and un-English proceeding, but a positive breach of faith; and I can imagine nothing more likely to deter men from enlisting than to feel that they cannot trust the English Government to keep faith with them.—I remain, yours truly,

M. C. MARTINEAU.

THE STORY OF GARIBALDI.

V.

THE HERMIT OF CAPRERA.

AFTER the fall of Palermo and the West, the eastern half of Sicily was soon reduced, and Garibaldi addressed himself to the seemingly impossible task of conveying his army, heavily reinforced, across the Straits of Messina, which were patrolled by the Neapolitan fleet. By a clever stratagem he drew his watchful foe to the northern end of the Straits while he carried his main force across 30 miles to the south. Pursued thither by the squadron, a second contingent then crossed with impunity in the flotilla of fishing-boats which had played the part of a decoy to the Neapolitan fleet. In Southern Italy resistance gave way speedily to hard blows and rapid movements, and the Liberator, with half a dozen friends, then set out on a race of 250 miles to Naples through mountain and forest and fever-stricken plains, entrusting his life to the people for whom he was fighting. "Here we are," exclaimed his friend Bertani, "seven of us, on seven mules, going to conquer a Kingdom." The soldiers followed their chief with loving ardour to the gates of death. And not without fear as well; for no slackness or licence was tolerated, and the youth who thought to slake his thirst with a bunch of grapes plucked from a wayside vineyard did so at the risk of being shot by his officer.

The King and Queen fled from Naples, leaving the fortresses strongly garrisoned. Garibaldi pressed fearlessly on, ending his long journey by rail. "Where are you going to?" cried an officer, rushing up and stopping the train. "The Bourbon troops have trained their cannon on the station of Naples." Garibaldi replied, unmoved: "Bother the cannon! When the people are receiving us like this there are no cannon." So it proved. He drove in an open carriage through the streets of the capital, under the very muzzles of the guns, amid a vast multitude of citizens delirious with joy. The hearts of the people were won. It remained to meet and overthrow in the field the regular forces of the tyrant, which were immensely superior in numbers to his own. This was achieved shortly after on the banks of the Volturno in the sternest of all Garibaldi's battles. And with that his great undertaking was accomplished; for Victor Emmanuel, who was to be King of all Italy, had brought his Northern army from Piedmont, and the memorable meeting of the two leaders took place near Capua, which surrendered with the last hope of the Bourbons a few days later. Thus, within six months from the landing of the Thousand in Sicily, the whole of Italy save Rome and Venice, which came in later, was united by the will of the people under one crown.

Garibaldi was now free to lay down the sword and take up the spade. He declined any kind of decoration or reward either for himself or his family. He had broken the bonds of a tyrant and helped to make a nation. That was his reward. Early one autumn morning he and his son Menotti, who had fought at his father's side, bade farewell to a little group of their comrades-in-arms, and sailed for their island home. Garibaldi had borrowed a few pounds from a friend to meet his immediate needs, and carried with him a bag of seed-corn for his farm. His life on Caprera was as beautiful in its simplicity as his valour had been glorious in battle. On his wind-swept granite island he cleared little patches of stony ground, and planted them with corn and olive and potato, building about them rough rock walls. His friends when visiting him gladly took their share of work with the spade. In the modest white house built by Garibaldi with their help generous hospitality but no luxury prevailed. He himself drank nothing during the day but water, and a bowl of new milk at night. Garibaldi took as tender thought for animals as for human beings. As a child he had cried at the sight of a wounded grasshopper. After all his battles and adventures on sea and land he was just as sensitive still. The thought of a caged bird was revolting to his passion for liberty, and he would allow no creature to be struck in his presence. The sight of a flower plucked wantonly, a broken branch, or a plant torn up by the roots gave him pain, for "the Great Spirit of Eternal Life is in everything," he said; and, like his fellow-countryman Francis of Assisi, he was brother to all living things. Plant, animal, and bird, the butterfly and himself, were alike "part of the soul of the universe, part of the infinite, part of God." Even in the midst of war, when he was Dictator of Naples, he gave up much time to improving the condition of the cab-horses of the city. His fine breed of Maltese goats ran wild about the cliffs. At sundown his voice was to be heard calling the cows by name to the milking. One evening it was rumoured that a new-born lamb had been lost among the rocks. Long search was made with a lantern over the crags and through the brushwood by Garibaldi and a party of friends, but without success. A wet night set in, and all the household retired to rest, except the master, who presently went out again. About midnight he was heard returning joyfully, carrying the lamb in his arms. For warmth he took it to bed with him, embracing it like a child, and giving it a bit of sponge dipped in milk to keep it quiet.

Still once and again the old hero drew his sword for liberty, but he had already fulfilled his special call. Over twenty years passed, and the gentle Hermit of Caprera, the Champion of Italian unity and freedom, lay dying. Propped up on the pillows, he watched the setting sun casting its glow on the sea and rocks. Two little birds which he had taught to come near him flew on to the window-sill and sat chirping. The nurses were about to drive them away lest they should disturb him, when Garibaldi spoke once again, bidding them let the little birds come in, and always to feed them after he was gone.

MEMORIAL NOTICES.

MR. WILLIAM LONG, J.P.

It is with deep regret that we have to announce the death of Mr. William Long, which took place at his home, Thelwall Heys, near Warrington, on Saturday, February 13, in his 81st year. Mr. Long, who came of an old Knutsford family, was born in Manchester on November 5, 1834. At the age of 15 he entered his father's business as a tanner at Grappenhall, near Warrington, and it was with Warrington and the surrounding district that he was closely identified for the rest of his life. His firm prospered, and he early won the reputation of being a successful business man with a high standard of integrity. Much of his spare time was given to public work. For many years he presided over the Bench in the Daresbury Division of Cheshire, and he was also a visiting justice of Knutsford Prison. Many philanthropic movements in Warrington had in him a generous friend. For nineteen years he was chairman of the Savings Bank; he was a vice-president and life governor of the Infirmary; and every movement for the improvement of the town and the preservation of its historical monuments had his full support. But his chief affection was for Cairo Street Chapel, for the fine memories of a liberal Nonconformity which gathered round it, its Sunday worship, and the work of its ministers. He also took an active part in wider denominational activities. He was President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association for 1893-4, Chairman for several years of the Sustentation Fund, and an active member of the committee of Manchester College, Oxford. It was due to his interest and generosity that the Warrington window was placed in the Library of the College by a number of friends to commemorate the worthies of the Warrington Academy. In politics Mr. Long was all his life an ardent Liberal. On the question of Home Rule he took the side of his friend Mr. Joseph Chamberlain for a time, but later he came back into close association with the Liberal Party, and frequently presided at meetings in the Knutsford Division.

Mr. Long was married in 1863 to Miss Emily J. Milner. He and his wife celebrated their golden wedding on July 28, 1913, amid many tokens of esteem and affection, especially from their work-people, with whom their relations have always been most friendly and cordial. The hospitality of their house at Thelwall, and later at Cleabarrow, their beautiful country home on the fells above Windermere, will remain as a gracious memory to many friends. The funeral took place at Grappenhall Church on Tuesday, when there was a large gathering of his own people from the village, deputations from public bodies, and many friends from a distance. A memorial service will be held in Cairo Street Chapel, Warrington, on Sunday morning, conducted by the Rev. W. H. Drummond.

MR. S. B. WORTHINGTON.

A LIFE remarkable in length of years and for the vigour of mind and spirit retained to the last was brought to a close on Monday morning, February 8, when Mr. Samuel Barton Worthington, in his ninety-fifth year, after only a day's illness, passed peacefully away. It was a life bound up with the first great days of railway enterprise in this country, marked by distinguished service for many years in an honourable profession, and in the fellowship of our own religious community, true to its best traditions of freedom and earnest piety, with an ardour of loyalty and quiet steadfastness of willing service which never faltered. For seventy years Mr. Worthington was a subscriber to Manchester College, successively in Manchester, London, and Oxford, and for twenty-one years, in the comparative leisure which followed his retirement from professional work, he served on its Committee. That is a record which it would be difficult to parallel.

Born at Stockport, December 14, 1820, his early home, except for the first few months, was in Manchester—first in Salford, then in Higher Broughton, and the boy attended successively the schools of the Revs. Edward Hawkes and J. R. Beard. At 16 he began his training as an engineer, and for six years was a pupil of Joseph Locke, friend and fellow-worker of George Stephenson. As a boy, in 1830, he had seen the opening of the Liverpool & Manchester Railway, and in the first year of his apprenticeship he went with Robert Stephenson on the first engine which ran from Liverpool to Birmingham. In the making of that line and of the Manchester and Sheffield, London and Southampton, and other lines on which his master was engaged, he gained his early experience; but most remarkable of all was the responsible share he had in the making of the first French railway, between Rouen and Paris. From 1840 he was for three years resident in Paris, and one of his vivid memories of that time was of seeing in the Seine the black-draped vessels which had just brought the remains of Napoleon from St. Helena.

On his return to England he was engaged in the construction of the Lancaster & Carlisle Railway, and on its completion became Resident Engineer of the line, with his home at Lancaster. That position he retained when his line was merged in the greater undertaking of the London & North-Western Railway, and he was Chief Engineer of the Northern Division of the line until his retirement in 1885. It was while at Lancaster that, in 1852, he married the third daughter of the Rev. Timothy Davis of Evesham, whose elder sister was the wife of William Herford, an old school-fellow of his at Dr. Beard's. Mr. Herford and his brother-in-law, David Davis, at that time had charge of the St. Nicholas Street Chapel, as well as of the school they conducted, and Mr. Worthington took loyal part with them in the life of the congregation and in efforts for the well-being of the town. They were all interested together in the work of the Mechanics' Institute. Those were the days of The Prospective Review, edited by Tayler, Martineau, Thorn, and Wicksteed, and Mr. Worthington often spoke with gratitude and enthusiasm of the splendid work it did, especially through Martineau's contributions, for leadership in thought and religious inspiration.

As at Lancaster, so later, on his return to Manchester, at Cross Street Chapel, the religious home of his boyhood, Mr. Worthington was closely identified with the life of the congregation, even during the most exacting years of his professional work, and he was Senior Trustee of the Chapel, as also of St. Nicholas Street, Lancaster, at the time of his death. When he retired from the railway it was not to idleness. For nine years he represented the Exchange Ward in the Manchester City Council. He was keenly interested in the work of elementary education, and also in the cause of temperance, with strong democratic sympathies, and he rendered service of special value on the Waterworks and Rivers Committees. Latterly his home was at Bowdon, and there, in 1891, came to him the sorrow of his wife's death. For himself there remained still many years of life, vigorous in mind and heart, and the beautiful mellowing of old age.

The funeral took place at Hale Chapel on Thursday week, when there was a large gathering of friends who had held him in honour and affection. The service was conducted by the Revs. Dendy Agate and E. L. H. Thomas.

TWO LETTERS OF THANKS.

WE print below two letters which have been received by Mrs. Bernard Allen acknowledging the help sent by our Belgian Hospital Fund. The first is from a doctor, and we give it in French, in order to preserve its flavour. The other, from the Mother Superior in charge of one of the hospitals, has been translated.

I.

MADAME,

J'ai l'honneur de vous exprimer ma profonde gratitude pour les nombreux objets, très utiles, que vous avez eu l'extrême bonté de me faire remettre, par l'intermédiaire de Monsieur —, pour les malades de l'Hôpital militaire belge de —.

Votre offre si généreuse témoigne de sentiments de solidarité humaine dont je me plais à apprécier toute la valeur et qui vous font le plus grand honneur.

A vrai dire, par votre générosité vous avez largement contribué à prouver que le cœur anglais est très grand et, sans doute, très sensible aux malheurs d'autrui.

Qu'il me soit permis, Madame, d'ajouter que les malheureuses victimes de la plus terrible des guerres, qui souffrent ici, couchés dans un petit hôpital, organisé dans les modestes locaux d'une école de pauvres, éprouveront de réels soulagements grâce à votre geste si gracieux. Quoi de plus gracieux, en effet, que celui d'une main féminine qui s'ouvre pour donner et qui se tend vers des malades pour les secourir ?

Beaucoup de choses me manquaient pour lutter efficacement contre l'affreuse maladie contagieuse dont ses malades sont atteints : la fièvre typhoïde contractée sur le champ de bataille.

Spontanément vous êtes venue combler cette lacune. Merci, Madame, de tout cœur, merci.

Si j'ai tenu à souligner la beauté de votre geste à l'égard de mes compatriotes, c'est que mon vif désir est que vous puissiez éprouver la plus sûre et la plus douce satisfaction : celle d'avoir soulagé les souffrances de ceux qui sont tombés au champ d'honneur, loin de leur foyers, loin de leur chère patrie.

C'est avec une sincère émotion qu'en leur nom je viens, très respectueusement, Madame, vous exprimer des sentiments de la plus grande reconnaissance.

Veuillez agréer, Madame, l'assurance de ma très haute considération,

LE MÉDECIN CHEF DE SERVICE.

II.

MADAM,

We received yesterday your kind gift of nine parcels, which you were good enough to inform us were coming for our wounded and invalided Belgian soldiers. Your kind heart has thought of all our sick ones, and it is with feelings of sincerest gratitude that we send our thanks to you and all those who are helping in this work of benevolence. May God bless and reward all our kind benefactors ; this we pray with all our heart.

We wish, Madam, that you could have witnessed our joy on opening the precious parcels in the midst of our soldiers. Each one had his choice, and one of the dressing-gowns went at once to an officer who is now getting up after more than three weeks in bed, and whom we are happy to see so well, for we were very much afraid that we should lose him. He was delighted, and looked well in his new costume. All the woollen garments, sheets, blankets, shirts—indeed, everything—gave the greatest pleasure, but the large red Nightingales were appreciated most of all. These attracted attention and won approval, not only because of their colour, but also on account of their quality, and the patients look very warm and neat in them. You may be quite sure, Madam, that everything has been very welcome, and will be of great use. How happy we are to be able to give warm clothing to our Belgian soldiers, not only when they are here, but also when they leave us to rejoin their comrades and go back to the front.

Madam, once more we offer our most grateful thanks to you and all who are helping you. It is to England we owe it that the Belgians have not had to suffer as much from the horrors of the war as they would have done, and your goodness to us has increased our affection and attachment to our generous Allies. Please accept, Madam, our grateful thanks and profound respect.

THE SUSTENTATION FUND.
ANNUAL MEETING.

THE Annual Meeting of the Contributors of the Sustentation Fund was held at Dr. Williams's Library, Gordon Square, W.C., on Wednesday, February 10. The Chair was taken by the President, Mr. W. Byng Kenrick, of Birmingham, and there were also present the Revs. C. Hargrove, J. E. Carpenter, W. Copeland Bowie, W. G. Tarrant, C. J. Street, Joseph Wood, James Harwood, Sir Edgar Chatfield Clarke, and Messrs. C. F. Pearson, E. J. Blake, T. Oliver Lee, G. J. Notcutt, Ion Pritchard, F. W. Monks, L. N. Williams, B. P. Burroughs, and Mr. Ronald P. Jones, Hon. Treasurer, and the Rev. W. H. Drummond, acting Hon. Secretary.

The Report recorded a year which has been marked by changes and developments in the administration of the Fund owing to the increase in income derived from the special appeal, and the detailed application of the general directions for the distribution of this increased income. It must, however, be noted that it was only during the second half of the year that the Managers have attempted to administer the enlarged Fund under the new conditions, and they have not yet the information which would enable them to make a general report of the effect on ministers and congregations in England and Wales, and the extension in the scope of their operations which is gradually being made possible. While the Managers have made it their aim to conform to the scale of minimum salaries, they have endeavoured to be careful that a minister of a congregation previously receiving a grant from the Fund should not, while holding the same charge, be prejudiced merely by reason of the modifications in the working arrangements between them and the Managers of the Augmentiaon Fund. Whenever it has seemed desirable the Managers have asked for some increase in the local contributions as a condition of receiving assistance from the Fund. In several cases this condition has been complied with. The income of the Fund for the year amounted to about £2,800, an increase of about £1,150 over that of 1913.

At the June meeting of the Board recommendations were received from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, giving a list of grant-aided churches which the Association regarded as permanently established, and therefore, outside the proper sphere of the Association's work. Twenty-four of these churches were added to the new list prepared by the managers for grants from the Fund, and the Association has thereby been relieved of grants amounting to about £450 per annum. This part of the Fund's work will increase in extent from year to year as churches continue to pass from the missionary stage to that of permanent settlement, a process for which it is assumed that a period of about ten years will be necessary in each case. The report also contains a special reference to the death of Mr. E. W. Marshall, Hon. Auditor of the Fund. Ever since its inception he had acted for the Board in this capacity, and the Managers express their grateful appreciation of his long and valuable services.

England	£1,640
Wales	510
Ireland	165
	£2,315

In moving the adoption of the Report and the Statement of Accounts, Mr. Kenrick remarked that the Managers during the past year had worked longer hours owing to the increase of their work. They made no claim to be shielded from criticism on account of their good intentions. All that they did claim was that whatever criticism reached them, should be well instructed. He thought it well to say this as some criticism had been due to ignorance of the rules and regulations of the Fund which had been public property for a considerable time. The co-operation of local associations throughout the country would be specially valued by the Managers. The resolution was seconded by Mr. C. F. Pearson, who congratulated the Managers on the work they had accomplished and their financial prudence. The Rev. C. Hargrove added a few words of cordial thanks on behalf of the Contributors for the care and consideration which had been given to the work.

The retiring Managers, the Rev. W. H. Drummond and Messrs. Byng Kenrick and E. J. Blake, whose term of office had expired, were re-elected as Managers of the Fund.

In moving that the cordial thanks of the Contributors be given to Mr. Byng Kenrick for his services as President, and that Sir Edgar Chatfield Clarke be President for the ensuing year. Principal Carpenter emphasised the deep debt of gratitude which they all felt they owed to Mr. Kenrick for the work which he had done. No name could be more satisfactory as his successor than that of Sir Edgar Chatfeild Clarke. In seconding the resolution the Rev. W. H. Drummond alluded to the combination of shrewd business gifts with sympathy for the difficulties of a minister's life, which had marked all Mr. Kenrick's work in connection with the Fund. The motion was carried with great cordiality, and Mr. Kenrick, in his reply, said that he had been specially struck by the reasonableness of mind which had pervaded all the work of the Board during his period of office. Sir Edgar Chatfeild Clarke said that it was a special pleasure to him to accept the Chairmanship after having served for eighteen years as Treasurer.

Mr. Ronald P. Jones was re-elected Hon. Treasurer, and Mr. H. F. Pearson, Hon. Secretary for the ensuing year. The Rev. W. H. Drummond was requested to continue as Acting Secretary while Mr. Pearson was prevented from doing the work owing to his special duties in connection with the War.

On the motion of the Treasurer the following resolution was adopted:—

That the Contributors desire to place on record their grateful appreciation for the valuable services rendered by the late Mr. Edwin W. Marshall as Hon. Auditor, and that it be left to the Managers to appoint an auditor for the year 1915.

The proceedings closed with a vote of thanks to the trustees of Dr. Williams's Library for the use during the year of one of their rooms for the meetings of the Fund.

THE REV. HERMANN HAUGERUD.

THE REV. HERMAN HAUGERUD, minister of the Unitarian Church in Christiania, Norway, arrived in London this week. He will preach at Upper Street, Islington, on Sunday morning next, February 21, and at High Street, Lewisham, in the evening. On February 28 he will preach at the Church of the Messiah, Birmingham; and, on March 7 at Bank Street Chapel, Bolton. He is at present free for Sunday, March 14, after which date he will be returning to Norway. Mr. Haugerud was encouraged by the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association to visit England, as he was desirous of learning and making known among his fellow-countrymen the conditions of thought and life prevalent in England during this time of national crisis. Any congregation desiring a week-evening address on present-day thought and feeling in Norway should write to him at Essex Hall, Essex Street, Strand, London. It may be added that Mr. Haugerud has an excellent command of the English language, and he is an interesting speaker.

BELGIANS IN HOLLAND.

THROUGH the generosity of American Unitarians the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie has recently transmitted £50 to assist Belgian refugees in Holland. Two large parcels of clothing were also forwarded from Essex Hall a few days ago to Prof. B. D. Eerdmans, of Leyden, well known to many English and American Unitarians by his presence at the meetings of the International Council. In a letter to hand he reports that the parcels of clothing arrived safely, and that Mrs. Eerdmans had been at work distributing the garments among those in greatest need. The clothing will be given chiefly to women and children who do not stay in the Central Shelter, and therefore cannot so easily get the things they sorely require. Prof. Eerdmans states that the distress and suffering of the Belgian refugees are greatest, not in cities like Leyden, but in parts of Holland close to the frontier of Belgium. With the monetary aid received from Essex Hall he hopes to do some little service in alleviating the misery that abounds.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Belfast.—Preaching on the subject of 'Patriotism and Social Service' at All Souls' Church on Sunday evening, February 14, the minister, the Rev. E. H. Pickering, said that the ideal of patriotism, though it loomed most potently before us when war was being waged, should be an ever-present ideal. That would, indeed, be an empire to fight and an empire to fight for if all were welded together as a band of brothers. But for that to be they had urgent need to develop the social consciousness, so that whilst working eagerly as individuals they should cease to think meanly or cravenly as individual units, but heroically and bravely as a united community. The social conscience was, indeed, no easy thing to develop, and yet there could be no doubt about it, the consciousness of social responsibilities was sweeping on like the incoming of a vast sea. Nothing could stop it ultimately, but it was for them to decide whether in pagan fearfulness they should refuse to go with it and so be swept away in wreck and ruin, or whether in Christian hopefulness they should take their place bravely in the stream, and join the onward rush of humanity to the new world of universal brotherhood. The more they developed their social consciousness and learnt the elementary Christian duty of loving the brotherhood, the more capable would they be of solving the problems that would arise after the war, bring order out of chaos, and turn the present sad experience into a national good.

Booth.—The Rev. Walter Short, minister of Booth Free Church, is delivering a course of Sunday evening sermons on 'Internationalism.' On February 7 his subject was 'Citizenship of the World,' on February 14 'International Law,' on February 21 he will speak on 'Internationalism,' and on the 28th on 'World Federation.'

Bridgewater.—Warm greetings and congratulations on the century of peace have been exchanged between Christ Church, Bridgewater, England, and 1st Church (Unitarian) Bridgewater, Mass., U.S.A. The minister of Christ Church having written to the minister of 1st Church, Bridgewater, Mass., enclosing a copy of the booklet 'Our Ancient Meeting House,' the minister of that Church (the Rev. Alfred D. K. Shurtleff) returned a very cordial reply, stating that he had read the letter to his congregation, and enclosing a copy of 'The Bridgewater Book,' an interesting description, with many views, of the American Bridgewater. This reply was read from the Christ Church pulpit, and was followed by a sermon on the Century of Peace and Treaty of Ghent.

Coventry.—After a ministry of nearly three years at Marple the Rev. Leonard Short has accepted the unanimous invitation of the Coventry congregation, and will begin his duties at the Great Meeting House, Smithford Street, on Easter Sunday, April 4. The late minister at Coventry, the Rev. George Heaviside, died in May, 1914, after a ministry of fifty-three years, dating from 1860. During that time industrial conditions in Coventry completely changed, and the population in a couple of decades increased by 40,000. Unfortunately, the old chapel failed to keep pace with this growth, and during the latter years of the pastor's ministry, when his health had failed, the congregation sadly decreased. The prospect for the future, however, is bright. There has been a careful canvass made of the friends of the congregation, its finances have been reorganised, and a membership roll constituted which since the beginning of the present year has received some fifty names, and the promise of a fair number of others, so that Mr. Short will begin with an effective strength of not less than sixty people, who are ready to support a vigorous effort to restore the church to its old position of influence in the town. The Midland Christian Union and the British and Foreign Unitarian Association are affording very substantial financial assistance, so that the congregation may be free at the outset to devote all its energies to the upbuilding of a living church. In November last the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, after a visit by its Secretary (Rev. W. Copeland Bowie), arranged for a series of six weeks' services, and these having proved successful; the Association is continuing the assistance until the settlement of Mr. Short.

London: Islington.—The Rev. Herman Haugerud, minister of the Unitarian Church, Christiania, Norway, will preach at Unity Church next Sunday morning (February 21) at 11. For many years Mr. Haugerud was minister of one of the Norwegian Unitarian congregations of the United States. He is visiting England in order to obtain authentic information respecting this country and the War, so as to remove the erroneous impressions circulated by Germany in Norway. Friends are invited to join the Islington congregation in giving a cordial welcome to our Norwegian visitor.

Midland Sunday School Association.—The Annual Meeting of this Association was held at Fazeley Street Mission, Birmingham, on February 13. Reports were presented by the Secretary and Treasurer, and also summaries of the reports received from the schools and from visitors. There are now on the roll of the Association 16 schools, 2 having joined during the year. From the statistics sent in, there are 3,727 scholars and 340 teachers connected with the schools in the area covered by the Midland Christian Union; of these the Birmingham district accounts for 2,397 scholars and 208 teachers. The usual work of the Association was carried out during the year. The Committee greatly regret that the magazine Church, School, and Home has been suspended owing to the war; it was meeting a distinct need in the churches and schools where it circulated. The report speaks of the difficulties under which many of the boys' departments are doing their work at present; in this connection we may note that nearly 200 teachers and elder scholars have joined the army since August last. The visitors' reports speak of several weak points, which may almost be considered chronic ailments, especially the lack of preparation on the part of teachers. There is still too much reliance on the story-book. On the other hand, where the teaching is Biblical, there is too often absence of comment, so that the lesson loses its effectiveness. Addresses were given by Mr. H. Titford of London, Rev. H. E. Perry of Stockport, Rev. W. E. George of Derby, and Rev. H. D. Roberts of Liverpool. The next quarterly meeting will be held at Lye, near Stourbridge, on April 10.

Pontypridd.—As the result of the South Wales and Monmouthshire Band of Hope Union Competitive Examination, held on December 11, the Unitarian Church Band of Hope has won the Lady Howard Shield for membership of under 125. Twenty-four Bands of Hope competed for this shield. Four years ago, at the first of these examinations, Pontypridd Unitarian Church took first place.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

THE POET OF THE 'DEAD END.'

Patrick MacGill, the poet and novelist, whose work has been commented on more than once in these columns, is training as a private in the London Irish Rifles, and expects shortly to go to the front. To a man who has "roughed it," and toiled laboriously in all sorts of company, stringing his rhymes together and studying the ways of men to the sound of the pick and shovel, a spell of soldiering will not come amiss, and we may be perfectly sure that he will find plenty of material for his pen on the battlefields of Flanders. Mr. MacGill has followed up his 'Children of the Dead End' with a novel entitled 'The Rat Pit,' the MS. of which is now in the publisher's hands. The title is not a pleasant one; but the "navvy poet" does not write for the entertainment of the average novel-reader, and, like the Russian writers who have explored the underworld, he deals with a class of society which has drained the cup of sordid poverty to the dregs.

THE MORAL EDUCATION LEAGUE.

We learn with regret that in consequence of financial difficulties created by the war the Moral Education League is compelled to dispense with the valuable services of Mr. F. J. Gould, who has acted as official demonstrator and lecturer for five years. Mr. Gould's untiring efforts to promote constructive educational ideals and character-training are well known to our readers, for he has frequently contributed to the columns of THE INQUIRER, and they will join with us in hoping that a fresh outlet will shortly be found for his enthusiasm and ability. We recently received a copy of the admirable Syllabus of Moral and Civic Instruction for the Elementary School compiled by Mr. Gould for the League on the supposition that, at least once a week in each class, and perhaps oftener, systematic lessons on the conduct of life are given by the teacher, or by some one acting in a similar capacity. This is the last, so far as we know, of a long series of publications which bear the stamp of an original mind, and have helped to stimulate the imagination and widen the mental horizons of thousands of parents and teachers throughout the land. Mr. Gould's system of teaching is almost as well known in America as it is in England, for he has lectured in nearly forty cities of the United States, where new ideas on education always awaken considerable public interest. During a tour in India he lectured in eight cities of the Bombay Presidency and Baroda with similar success, and those who have read 'Youth's Noble Path,' and other books, know to what excellent use he has put his studies of the ancient history and Scriptures of the East. With so many friends in different parts of the world, and such a splendid record of work behind him, we feel sure that Mr. Gould is only at the beginning of a new period of usefulness to the cause he has already served for twenty years.

SUSTENTATION FUND.

At the Annual General Meeting of the Contributors held in Dr. Williams's Library, London, at 12.30 P.M. on Wednesday, February 10, 1915, Mr. W. Byng Kenrick in the chair, the Annual Report and Balance Sheet were presented, and the following Resolutions adopted, viz.:—

THAT the Report and Accounts as now read be adopted and printed for circulation among the contributors and friends of the Fund.

THAT the retiring Managers, the Rev. W. H. Drummond and Messrs. W. Byng Kenrick and E. J. Blake, whose term of office has expired, having been nominated, and the requisite number of voting papers having been produced, be and are hereby elected as Managers of the Fund.

THAT the sincere thanks of the Contributors be tendered to Mr. W. Byng Kenrick for his services as President during the past year, and that Sir Edgar Chatfield Clarke be elected President for the year 1915.

THAT the thanks of the Contributors be given to Mr. Ronald P. Jones for his services as Hon. Treasurer during the past year, and that he be appointed to the office for the coming year.

THAT the thanks of the Contributors be given to Mr. Harold F. Pearson for his services during the past year, and that Mr. Pearson be appointed Hon. Secretary, and the Rev. W. H. Drummond acting Hon. Secretary for the year 1915.

THAT the Contributors desire to place on record their grateful appreciation of the valuable services rendered by the late Mr. Edwin W. Marshall as Hon. Auditor of the Fund for many years, and that it be left to the Managers to appoint an auditor for the year 1915.

THAT the Contributors heartily thank the Trustees of Dr. Williams's Library, who have granted the use of rooms for the meetings of the Fund during the past year.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.

IN spite of some difficulties of transit at the end of last week, we were able to send a large consignment of clothes and hospital requisites from our Fund. It consisted of 75 cases. Our friend had not returned from France at the time of going to press, but our readers may be confident that the work of distribution was carried through as quickly and effectively as usual. We are expecting almost hourly to receive fresh lists, and no time will be lost in supplying what is needed. We have received some most acceptable parcels from working parties this week, for which we are very grateful. If there is any doubt about the kind of garments most in demand Mrs. Allen will be glad to supply full particulars.

THE threat of Germany against the shipping of the world has been responsible for some disasters in the Channel; but the chief injury which she has done by this mad and criminal policy is against herself in the still deeper alienation of all decent feeling from her, and the savage and well-nigh incurable wound which she has inflicted upon her own national character. She has destroyed the very sources of chivalry for the rising generation, and is now training them in the admiration of what is detestable. It is this policy of spiritual suicide which makes the whole situation so terrible, and seems to banish even the possibility of a good understanding. Harder than the rehabilitation of Belgium will be the recovery in Germany of the moral reverence which alone can entitle her to a place in the comity of civilised nations. As Dr. A. C. Bradley remarked the other day, any Englishman who loves the soul of her which beat in her great musicians, philosophers, and poets must desire her total defeat for her own sake, as well as the world's. "It is incredible," he said, "that that soul is dead, and that anguish would not wake it from its evil dream."

A LETTER which has been published this week from Sir Edward Grey to Mr. H. C. Hoover, Chairman of the Commission for Relief in Belgium, makes it quite clear that our Government is willing to take a generous share in the task of feeding the people of Belgium, if certain necessary conditions are fulfilled. "I was able to inform you last month," Sir Edward Grey writes, "that his Majesty's Government would grant the Commission a monthly subvention to enable it to carry on its work, on condition that the German Government would undertake to cease all requisitions of food of any kind, and all levies and contributions of any kind whatever in Belgium, with the exception, of course, of such taxation of the people as is admitted under the Hague Convention." To these conditions the German Government has refused to accede. The extortionate levy of forty million francs a month is to be continued. "Solely on account of this attitude on the part of the German Government," the letter concludes, "the proposed arrangement between his Majesty's Government and the Commission must be regarded as having broken down. We shall, of course, maintain our general favourable attitude towards your work, and our offer of financial support will remain open in the event of the German Government receding from their present position in regard to their levies in Belgium; but, for the moment, the idea of a direct subvention out of Government funds towards the charitable work of the Commission must remain in abeyance."

THE question whether the clergy should be combatants is being eagerly debated in The Times. Some writers evidently feel a practical difficulty, if the clergy urge laymen of their own age to enlist when they are not prepared to do it themselves. Others are swayed by more sentimental reasons, for while honouring the soldier, they feel that the clergy would be degrading their profession if they went into the fighting line. The Rev. William Temple thinks that a conclusive reason against enlistment is to be found in the fact that at ordination they became "official representatives of an international society—the Catholic Church—and that involves forgoing the right to act in a purely national capacity unless the Church is to be robbed of its Catholic witness precisely when that witness is most needed." This strikes us as a very risky line of argument to adopt. On the one hand it might be used to warn off the clergy from any concern with citizenship and national ideals. On the other, it seems to claim for them a duty of representing Christianity in the world, which does not belong to the laity, and that leads straight to the worst vices of clericalism.

WE do not suppose for a moment that Mr. Temple intends his words to be taken in this way; but it shows the danger of trying to find hard and fast rules or conclusive reasons in a matter which is largely one of expediency and the observance of a sense of fitness and proportion in the performance of duty. The clergy, like other men, must ask themselves in what capacity they can serve their country best. The testimony in regard to the influence of some of them who are serving in the ranks seems conclusive evidence of the good which they are doing by their example. But there is equal bravery and faithfulness in those who resist the stirring appeals to go to the front in order to maintain a sound religious atmosphere at home. The following words, taken from a letter in The Times of Thursday, put this side of the matter with admirable clearness and force:—

The war—this devastating clash of ideals—cannot last for ever. There is the settling down after the convulsion to be faced and organised. There is the vast mass of the population to consider. Here our pastoral duty clearly lies—to teach steadiness and calm; to arrest the evils which inevitably attend this gigantic upheaval of our normal life; to preach moderation and self-denial; to make ready for the victorious return of our troops—when triumph will lend itself only too readily to licence—by convincing people that our cause is not that of intemperate force, but the firm conviction that we stand for what makes life sweet and hopeful. Surely there is enough work—patriotic, beneficent, and Christian—for those who feel, reluctantly, that their prime duty is to serve by abiding patiently, and without the glamour of romance, at the great work at home—a work whose permanent and necessary value is apt to be forgotten in the infectious enthusiasms of a great, horrible, and temporary war.

THE REV. B. H. STREETER, the new Canon of Hereford, has contributed a very sane and helpful essay entitled

'War, this War, and the Sermon on the Mount' to the series known as "Papers for War Time." Speaking of the political entente which preceded the war, and the tendency to make us all equal partners in the guilt of destroying the world's peace, he writes:—

The choice which Britain had to make last August must be judged in relation to the situation of last August, not to the situation which would have existed if during the previous half-century all the diplomatists of Europe had been wiser, and all the nations more Christian, than was as a matter of fact the case.

CANON STREETER is equally plain spoken in his treatment of the Christian precept "Love your enemies." He points out that in war it is the cause and not the individual enemy that is fought against. The soldier seldom hates in a personal way. Moreover, "love" does not mean "the exact emotional regard that we have towards our nearest and dearest." To love our enemies means to wish them well and to do them good.

If an innocent individual [he writes] is acting as the instrument of an evil cause, it is better that he should die than the evil cause should triumph—at least, if the evil is on a sufficiently large scale. It is better that some thousands of Germans should die, fighting nobly for what they believe a just cause, than that millions of Belgians and Frenchmen should live for generations under a degrading tyranny. And the soldier who causes their death does not act in hate.... If the soldier is convinced that with the cause for which he is fighting is involved the welfare of humanity as a whole, including therefore, in the long run, that of Germany also, he can not only shoot the German in the trenches opposite without any feeling of personal dislike, but he can do so for the love of man. And this is not only possible, it is what in nine cases out of ten, is actually being done. But all this concentration on the fact that the soldier, like the executioner, is bound sometimes to take life, obscures the really vital point. The soldier is before all things a man who is ready to die for his country; and readiness to die for others is essentially a Christian thing.

ALL that the Dean of St. Paul's writes is excellent in quality, stimulating, and often provocative. Three lectures on 'Christian Saintliness,' which have appeared in full in recent numbers of The Guardian, deserve to rank among his best work. Extraordinarily rich in thought, they also display the sympathy and critical insight of the really tolerant mind. The last of the series, on "The Broad or Liberal Type," is the most suggestive alike for the fineness of its appreciation and the candour of its admission of defects. He warns us that there are Liberal theologians who are not interested in religion at all. "The scholar does not become a Christian theologian by editing St. John or writing a history of dogma, any more than an orthodox apologist becomes a scholar by undertaking the same tasks." But he is quick to see that the Liberal who "will not consent to play tricks upon himself, to pretend to know what he does not know, or force a conviction which he does not feel to be justified by the evidence," may be a humble worshipper of God, and contribute something of original worth to the stock of Christian piety. Such a man has had to submit not only to the inward difficulties of faith which surround real honesty of soul, but also to the external trials which spring from "the loss of the sympathy of other religious people, the storm of calumny and vituperation, often joined in by persons whom he cannot despise or disregard, to which he is frequently exposed, the perverse misunderstanding of his views and purposes which he has constantly to meet."

THE lecture concludes with the following noble plea for the place of the saint of the liberal type within the Church, and the special contribution which he has to make to the life of the modern world:—

It is absolutely essential, if the Church is to take its proper place in the twentieth century, that some of our saints should be thinkers, some of our thinkers saints. It is for the Liberal Churchman to show in his own life that there is no necessary connection between intellectual candour or courage, and religious lukewarmness or lack of spirituality. Is it too much to hope that Liberal theology may have its own distinctive type of saint, who may discharge in the twentieth century much the same high and noble function that moral philosophy discharged in the later age of antiquity? I picture to myself a highly cultivated man, austere simple in his manner of life, but no ascetic; a man who, because his own citizenship is in heaven and his deepest life hid with Christ in God, longs, with a prophet's yearning, to reform human society according to the pattern showed him in the Mount; who believes that the Church of England has no interests except the highest welfare of the people of England; who knows that the river of truth receives affluents from every side, and will therefore learn readily from all who are able to teach him; who brings out of his treasury things new and old, old things made new, and new things that were true before the world was; the pioneer of that nobler civilisation, that purer Christianity, which we dream of as destined one day to renew the youth of the nations of the West.

M. SABATIER'S MESSAGE.

WE print to-day a charming letter to our readers from the pen of M. Paul Sabatier. We should be less than human if we were not deeply gratified to be remembered by him in such a generous way at this time of close alliance and common anxiety. But the letter is much more than the private greeting of an honoured friend. It is a word spoken, through us, to our countrymen by a man who has a wide knowledge of a contemporary religious life and unbounded confidence in the spiritual future of France. M. Sabatier assures us that the spirit in which we have entered upon the War has meant to his countrymen something far more precious than material succour and support. He hails us as benefactors who have helped to confirm their faith in the supremacy of moral ideals. We can imagine many men who are bearing the burden and heat of the day, saying to themselves, 'What have we done to deserve such praise? We are only doing our duty.' But that is probably what M. Sabatier means. This quiet uprising of the whole nation at the call of honour and duty, without a thought about danger or any reckoning of material loss or gain, is a spiritual act which is already bearing fruit in the soul of France. Even amid the devastation of war, the immortal work of spiritual creation is in progress. If we are really instruments in the hands of a Higher Power, and are engaged not only in fighting battles, but in moulding men, we can only express our deep gratitude to the friend who has told us, in all sincerity, this noble and consoling truth.

M. Sabatier's words prompt us to say two things. In the first place we want to assure him that the moral debt is reciprocal. We owe to France in all the higher reaches of life, at least, as much as France can ever receive from us. In many directions her civilization is one of the noblest achievements of the human spirit. It has its roots deep in the soil of the past. It is rich in the fruit of artistic creation, of political thought, and of religious genius. Her literature is the only one which, alike in the rich variety of its forms and the skill of its execution, can be compared with our own. The political misunderstandings of the past are at an end. The weary weight of German pedantry has been lifted from our minds. We have ceased to judge the whole French people by a few abnormal and unpleasing phases of their life. We are, in a word, owing to the things which, day by day, we suffer and endure together, more capable of receiving the splendid gifts which France has to bestow upon us, than we have ever been before. There are, of course, many English people, and we think we may claim to be among the number, who did not require the harsh discipline of war in order to awaken in them this lively sense of spiritual obligation; but now we can with one voice make M. Sabatier's words our own, and thank our friend and neighbour, not only for the security which we feel in our military alliance with her, but even more for the quickening she imparts to the whole of our spiritual life.

In the second place, we must all recognise that there is a great obligation laid upon us not to be unworthy of the confidence which the best minds in France have placed in our clear sense of honour, our love of freedom, and our national idealism. These things will be searched out mightily before the War is over. The days of severest testing have still to come, for we have not yet lost the freshness of our first resolve, and nothing has occurred to damp for long the ardour of our hopes. Ours, then, is the difficult task of going on as we have begun. We have to fulfil to the best of our powers the high expectations which others have formed of us, not in action alone, but in all the deeper elements of character. And we must do it with resolute will, when it seems natural to hate our enemies or to indulge our rage and our desire of vengeance against them. None of us is so good that he may not be sorely tempted in this way. At these moments, when the power to help others to be faithful to their moral ideals is slipping away from us because we are ceasing to be faithful to them ourselves, some of us will find a sure way of recovery in the recollection of the message which M. Sabatier has sent to us. It is words like his, so full of quiet confidence that, as a people, we will be true to our best, and remain through good and ill report worthy of the moral confidence of France, which put strength into our souls.

Good Thoughts for Cvil Times.

THE PRICE OF FREEDOM.

THESE are the times that try men's souls. The summer soldier and the sunshine patriot will, in this crisis, shrink from the service of their country; but he that stands it now, deserves the love and thanks of man and woman. Tyranny, like hell, is not easily conquered; yet we have this consolation with us, that the harder the conflict, the more glorious the triumph. What we obtain too cheap, we esteem too lightly; it is dearness only that gives anything its value. Heaven knows how to put a proper price upon its goods; and it would be strange, indeed, if so celestial an article as freedom should not be highly rated.—From 'The Crisis,' by Thomas Paine.

FRA UGO TO THE SUFFERERS IN HOSPITAL.

Let us take heed in time
That God may now be glorified in us;
And while we suffer, let us set our souls
To suffer perfectly: since this alone,
The suffering, which is this world's special grace,
May here be perfected and left behind.

—But in obedience and humility;—
Waiting on God's hand, not forestalling it.
Seek not to snatch presumptuously the palm
By self-election; poison not thy wine
With bitter herbs if He has made it sweet;
Nor rob God's treasuries because the key
Is easy to be turned by mortal hands.
The gifts of birth, death, genius, suffering,
Are all for His hand only to bestow.
Receive thy portion, and be satisfied.
Who crowns himself a king is not the more Royal; nor he who mars himself with stripes
The more partaker of the Cross of Christ.

But if Himself He come to thee, and stand Beside thee, gazing down on thee with eyes
That smile and suffer; that will smite thy heart,

With their own pity, to a passionate peace ;
And reach to thee Himself the Holy Cup, (With all its wreathen stems of passionflowers

And quivering sparkles of the ruby stars), Pallid and royal, saying ' Drink with Me ' ;

Wilt thou refuse ? Nay, not for Paradise !

The pale brow will compel thee, the pure hands

Will minister unto thee ; thou shalt take
Of that communion through the solemn depths

Of the dark waters of thine agony,
With heart that praises Him, that yearns to Him

The closer through that hour. Hold fast
His hand,

Though the nails pierce thine too ! take only care

Lest one drop of the sacramental wine
Be spilled, of that which ever shall unite Thee, soul and body to thy living Lord !

A PRAYER FOR THE SAFETY OF OUR FLEETS.

O Eternal Lord God, Whose Voice, mighty in operation, the raging Seas and stormy Winds obey ; Who hast com-passed the Ocean with its bounds, saying,
" Hitherto shalt thou come, but no further, and here shall thy proud waves be stayed " ; O God, who in Thy Mercy, guidest the Mariner through the trackless Deep ; receive, we beseech Thee, into Thy Gracious and Almighty Protection, the Fleets of Thy Servant our Sovereign, the vessels of our Merchants, and the Persons of all those who serve in them.
Preserve them from the Perils of the Seas, the efforts of the Enemy, and from the Danger of Disease in distant Climates ; that they may return in safety, and Crowned, if it be Thy good pleasure, with success in their Enterprises, either of just and necessary War, or of lawful Commerce, to enjoy the Blessings of their native Land ; and with thankful remembrance of all Thy Mercies, to unite with us in rendering praise and glory to Thy Holy Name, through Jesus Christ our Lord.—Amen.

on March 9, 1796, " By His Majesty's Special Command."]

M. PAUL SABATIER ON THE NEW SPIRIT IN FRANCE.

It is with great pleasure that we are able to publish to-day, a translation of a letter which we have received from M.
Paul Sabatier.

La Maisonnette,

par St. Sauveur-de-Montagut (Ardèche).

February 8, 1915.

DEAR FRIENDS OF THE INQUIRER,—

It was only to-day that I saw in your issue of January 30, the very cordial words which you have addressed to me.
They have moved me more than I can say, and I am deeply grateful to you for them.

My letter to Prof. Falcinelli was very far from anticipating such a glorious fate as it has had. It was an entirely private letter from a friend to his friends, in which I simply tried to show them why I could not approve of their pacific manifesto without reservations. How great was my astonishment when I received a telegram in which they asked for my permission to publish it.

I could wish that I was a poet in order to attempt to express what is going on in the mind and heart of France. It has its roots in the past, and it is, nevertheless, something entirely new. Our history for the last six months has been, above all, a series of moral emotions. And by an ineffable mystery these emotions are the same, and coincide in point of time, in all parts of the country, and in all surroundings. Perhaps it would be true to say that they are more intense in the country districts where, at the moment, life is somewhat more continuous and coherent, less scattered and broken up by details and the daily news.

Among these moral emotions one of the deepest has been provided for us by Great Britain. When it was known that your country and France were going to march hand in hand, to be but one heart and one soul, there was an immense and intimate feeling of joy. And this joy did not come merely from the material support which you have brought to us ; its source was, above all things, spiritual.
The humblest sections of our people experienced a sense of happiness—a happiness, to a certain extent, disinterested, when they saw your country, which we had been accustomed to regard as the most preoccupied with the ideal and with peace, at our side. It meant that the new and moral character of this war was assured from the beginning.

Here, my dear friends, is a great and enduring benefit, which France owes to you, and for which she has hardly thought of thanking you. I hope I may have succeeded in lisping our gratitude to you until others, with greater authority, are able to do it.

The Entente, the Alliance, were already excellent things. You have added to them another which no diplomatic paper could have ever created—the communion of hearts for the achievement of a good action.

Yours, with all gratitude,

PAUL SABATIER.

THE YOUNG SOLDIER.

YOUNG soldier, whither goest thou ?

I go to fight for God and for the altars of my country.

May thy arms be blessed, young soldier !

Young soldier, whither goest thou ?

I go to fight for justice, for the holy cause of the peoples, for the sacred rights of the human race.

May thy arms be blessed, young soldier !

Young soldier, whither goest thou ?

I go to fight to deliver my brothers from oppression, to break their chains, and the chains of the world.

May thy arms be blessed, young soldier !

Young soldier, whither goest thou ?

I go to fight against wicked men, for those whom they overthrow and trample under their feet, against the masters for the slaves, against the tyrants for liberty.

May thy arms be blessed, young soldier !

Young soldier, whither goest thou ?

I go to fight to drive away hunger from the cottage, and to restore abundance, peace, and joy.

May thy arms be blessed, young soldier !

Young soldier, whither goest thou ?

I go to fight to overthrow the barriers which separate men one from another, and prevent them from embracing one another as sons of the same Father.

May thy arms be blessed, young soldier !

Young soldier, whither goest thou ?

I go to fight to free from the tyranny of man, thought, speech, and the conscience.

May thy arms be blessed, young soldier !

Young soldier, whither goest thou ?

I go to fight that all may have in Heaven
a God, and on earth, a country.

May thy arms be blessed, seven times blessed, young soldier !

RIGHT OR WRONG.

SIR,—As the article by Ignotus appears to be a reply to my recent letter on 'Christianity and War,' may I crave space to offer a few further words on the subject. I appreciate the attitude of the writer, and I agree that "right" and "wrong" are relative terms; but I understand them to relate to the absolute also. Webster (1907) in his third definition of "right" gives the following quotation from Whately: "That which is conformable to the Supreme Rule is absolutely right, and is called right simply, without relation to a special end."

This is how I understand it. If, therefore, the word "right" can be applied to the absolute, so also can its opposite "wrong." For England to take up arms against Germany is relatively right. If it were not so I should not have joined the National Volunteer Defence Force, and be ready to fight if it comes to that. But because I think that war in the absolute is wrong I feel no "paralysis of mind and will," and I am not "robbed of all joy in and readiness to make sacrifice for the cause." What I am prevented in feeling is a glory in bloodshed and destruction, and this I count as gain. Since sending my letter I have read, in The Hibbert Journal, Mr. Edward Willmore's article 'Why we are Fighting,' which is partly a reply to Sir Henry Jones, whose attitude and mine would appear to be alike. Mr. Willmore says in effect—war cannot be both right and wrong. I maintain that war can be relatively right and is absolutely wrong, however unintelligible this view may be to Ignotus.

I do not call it "guessing at" an absolute standard to believe that a perfect being would be controlled entirely by love, and would not seek the hurt of a fellow being. To me this is a certainty of the future, far off it may be, but a certainty nevertheless, and attainable by man. We are constantly falling far short of our ideals; indeed, as Tolstoy says—an ideal ceases to be an ideal if ever it is attained. But if we have no ideals God pity us. If more idealism were put into our daily motives and actions than is the case now, there would be less enmity and strife in the world. As Ignotus says—this may be merely a question of words, our attitudes may be really alike. But if words are inadequate to express the highest aspirations of the spirit, so much the worse for words. Far be it from me to set anybody's feet "on the path which leads through dismay to defeat." I am no pessimist, but I cannot trim my conscience to call right what I know to be wrong, except in the way already explained.—Yours, &c.,

FORCE IS NO REMEDY.

SIR,—Mr. Martin tells us that it is better to be ruled over by a foreigner than to go to war. "After all," he writes, "some of the noblest lives have been lived and some of the noblest literature produced by men of a subject race." So then we should have allowed the German hordes to invade Britain, and when our women and children and old men had been murdered (as in Belgium), when our young men, under Prussian officers, were becoming proficient in the goose-step, we might have consoled ourselves with the gratifying thought that literary genius was making immortal songs about it all! But what if even this consolation had been denied us? Is it not a fact that the great literature produced by some subject races has been inspired by discontent with their condition and the passionate desire to throw off the galling yoke, and at the earliest moment to achieve their freedom? Mr. Martin would now have had us content with our servitude. Indeed, I understand, we should have been expected to glory in it; since we should have recognised that by submitting to it we had taken the only righteous course. Under these circumstances how could our poets have sung their plaintive or passionate songs? They would perhaps have spent their time paraphrasing "all's right with the world." Still the result might not have been wholly evil; for one never feels so firmly convinced that all is wrong with the world as when hearing the opposite sentiment mouthed. I fear that in any case, therefore, Mr. Martin would have been disappointed with the nation's temper.—Yours, &c.,

A. GOLLAND.

'THE IMMORALITY OF NON-RESISTANCE.'

SIR,—In THE INQUIRER of February 20 you devote an article to Mr. Lloyd Thomas's book on this subject. I have not read the book, but judging by your account of it the author misses the essential point on which Christian pacifists base their position. They maintain that the right attitude is not one of mere passive non-resistance, but of active goodwill. The expression "non-resistance" implies that the wrong is all on one side, and since in every war each belligerent is always firmly convinced that he is the injured party, each consequently always insists that he is justified in resistance. We know that the Germans are just as confident of the justice of their cause as we are. William Penn did not save Pennsylvania from Indian raids by announcing that scalps might be taken with impunity, but by showing active friendship with his Indian neighbours, and the present war could never have happened if the nations of Europe, including ourselves, had adopted the same method.—Yours, &c.

LEONARD DONCASTER.

Cambridge, February 22, 1915.

SIR,—Mr. Lloyd Thomas, and all others who argue against the literal interpretation of the texts "resist not evil" and "turn the other cheek," think that they know what the result of such action would be, but it has been tried so rarely that they have practically no evidence to go upon, and can only say what they think would happen. The only historical instance of such action which I know of does not confirm this theory. When William Penn and his friends settled in America, the Red Indians continually attacked such settlers, who naturally believed that their existence depended on self-defence. Penn's colony from the first did nothing to protect themselves, and—surely one may argue, in consequence—were never attacked. After eighty years they conformed to the practise of their neighbours and bought guns to defend themselves, and from that time they, too, were raided by the Indians. I once read in an autobiography, unfortunately I forget whose, an equally striking instance. The writer, a collier I think, after he had become convinced of the duty to turn the other cheek, quarrelled with a mate, who struck him in the face. He felt the testing moment had come, and with a desperate effort turned the other cheek and received another blow, whereupon his antagonist, to his astonishment, broke down and asked his pardon. Such acts could only be done from the highest motives, leaving the result to God. If a nation refrained from war on a calculation that it was safest, the result foreseen by Mr. Lloyd Thomas would surely come. But it cannot be argued from that that if these commands were obeyed in the spirit of the Teacher, the result would be the same, as the above historical instance proves. "For whosoever would save his life shall lose it, and whosoever shall lose his life for My sake shall find it."—Yours, &c.

FRENCH FOR OUR SOLDIERS.

SIR,—I have for the last three months been teaching French in a school organised by the Workers Educational Association under the Hampshire County Council to Seaforth Highlanders and men of the Hampshire Regiment. Concurrently through the attention directed by the press to the methods employed at our school I have entered into correspondence with many persons interested in the subject. Indeed I have received over 300 letters from those already teaching, from those wishing to learn, and from those willing to teach. It appears to me that whilst much has been done already to meet the demand, from soldiers for French lessons, there is a real opportunity for further work. May I therefore take advantage of your columns to give the following information and advice to such of your readers as are interested in the subject. It appears clear from the reply given by the President of the Board of Education to a question asked by Mr. George Roberts in Parliament on February 10 that neither the War Office nor the Board of Education see their way to taking further direct action in the matter. It follows that classes should be arranged in conjunction with the local military authorities, and, where it can be obtained, the assistance of the local educational authority. It therefore behoves those individuals who are willing to teach to get into touch with the adjutant or commanding officer of any regiment stationed where they reside, and, if no class is already organised, at once to offer their services; they should then apply to the local educational authority for financial and other help if required.

Might I add that a short memorandum explaining the system used so successfully with Seaforth Highlanders and others in the school here of teaching through conversational songs, music, and the acting of little plays can be obtained from me at Steep, Petersfield, or from the Workers Educational Association at 14, Red Lion Square, London. This method has proved to be especially helpful to amateurs and Belgians.—Yours, &c.

HOLIDAY HOME AT SOUTHBEND.

SIR,—Will you kindly allow me the hospitality of your columns in order that I may make known to the Unitarian public the financial state of affairs with regard to the Southend Holiday Home (Bernard House) owned by the London Sunday School Society. We have now had three years' experience in the new house, with the following financial result:—

At the close of 1912 the deficit amounted to £30. At the close of 1913 there was a balance of £1 7s. 3d., and now at the close of 1914 there is a deficit of about £25. The deficits have been met from the late Mrs. Bayle Bernard's legacy of £100. The meaning of these figures is that our present subscriptions cannot pay for repairs, as well as for maintenance (visitors' contributions cover board expenses plus firing and lighting). In 1913 practically no repairs were needed, and the Home just paid its way. Last year we were obliged to spend more than £20 on repairs, and we are now faced with a deficit to that amount.

Ten years ago the Society received five subscriptions of £5 or more, now it receives only one subscription of £5. Thus the interest in the Home is not less, but smaller subscriptions are the order of the day. Are there not enough friends amongst us with something to spare who will help to increase the subscriptions by £20?—Yours, &c.,

FOR THE CHILDREN.

THE GOOD GREY POET.

FIFTY years ago this spring the most terrible conflict in history, next to the War now raging, was drawing to a close in America. It was the stupendous struggle between the Northern and Southern States which ended in the liberation of the slaves. Between three and four million men had been called out, and over half a million lives lost; but through the patient wisdom and indomitable courage of President Lincoln the victory for freedom was at last won after a conflict of four years. As the war went on and Washington, with its fifty military hospitals, became a veritable city of sick and wounded soldiers, a tall, powerful, bearded man with ruddy face and kind grey eyes—with grey clothes, too, and a soft slouch hat—was to be seen every day going in and out of the wards. He was not a doctor, but was allowed by the War Department to give help in his own way wherever he could. He was known as the "Friend of the Wounded." His own brothers were serving in the field, and he could have fought well too, for he was a very brave strong man; but he thought he could do more good in other ways, though it cost him not less than if he had been under fire at the front. When the war broke out he made a vow that he would live very simply, drinking only water and milk, and eating no rich food, in order to keep his body "pure, perfect, sweet, and robust," and thus be well equipped to help in restoring the sick and wounded to health by imparting to them some of his own immense vigour of body and spirit. Provided with no medicine but his own magnetic presence, he proved himself a good physician indeed. Sometimes he would leave the city for the battlefield. From one such journey we see him returning. It is past midnight when he knocks at the door of a friend asking for supper. He is wearing army boots, his sleeves are rolled up and his coat is slung across his arm. He has just come in with a train-load of wounded from the front, and has seen his charges settled in the hospitals. Thither he went daily to look after the "boys in white," students and artisans, clerks and cowboys from the West, taking them fruit, tobacco, and other comforts for which his friends provided money. He sat by their bedsides writing letters for them, chatting, reading, reciting poetry, and cheering them back to life; and when one was too ill, he would sit by him speechless, giving the sufferer the silent comfort of his tender, motherly heart, and leaving him with a kiss at night. He kept a careful record of his patients and their needs in little notebooks stained with blood and tears. Here is an extract, one out of hundreds: "In one of the hospitals I find Thomas Haley, 4th New York Cavalry—a regular Irish boy, shot through the lungs. He lies there with his frame exposed above the waist, all naked for coolness, a fine-built man. It is useless to talk to him with his sad hurt. I often come and sit by him in perfect silence." "Come again, Walt!" the lads would call after "the man with the face of an angel." Next day, maybe, he would appear with an armful of wild flowers which he had been out into the country to gather, and would strew them over the beds. "I believe no men ever loved each other as I and some of these poor wounded, sick and dying men love each other," said he. The medicine of love was indeed doing its work potently, curing wounds and fevers; but such service cannot be given without sacrifice. Walt Whitman, the prophet-poet of America, was spending the energies of his great radiant soul to lift these multitudes of shattered men and boys on to their feet again. After nearly three years' heroic labour on the battlefield and in the hospitals, "distributing himself" as he put it, he broke down, paralysed by the strain. Thereafter he never fully recovered the buoyant splendour of his youthful vigour. "The Good Grey Poet" who thus "did his bit" by bringing great armfuls of sunshine and hope and "air-sweetness" to wounded men, had written a little book of wonderful poems just like himself, to which he gave the modest title "Leaves of Grass."

But he could get no publisher to print them. He had composed some of them when he was working as a carpenter. So, after writing them out five times to make them as perfect as he could, Whitman set up the type with his own fingers and printed the book himself. But when people read it they could not understand it, so they jeered at the author and pronounced him evil-minded, and he was dismissed from his post in a State office. But he bore all this with patient good temper, feeling sure that one day people would understand, and would see that his thoughts were broad-spanning and beautiful like rainbows, bringing new life to men and women.

SOUTH AFRICAN NOTES.

SOUTH AFRICA is surely the most unfortunate and unhappy of British colonies. Other offshoots of Great Britain may send their contingents to help in the great struggle, but South Africa has war actually thrust upon her in her very gates, and, in addition, the most hateful form of rebellion—rebellion not so much for ideals or principles, but largely the outcome of embittered personal and party jealousies and racial animosities. The movement was foolish and hopeless from the beginning, and it is matter for surprise that any responsible or experienced politician could engage in it. An independent South Africa, in the present state of the world, is regarded by the vast majority of people here as a thing impossible, and a South Africa under German over-lordship is, to say the least, extremely undesirable. What, then, were the causes of the rebellion? The Government itself must bear a share of responsibility, at any rate, in so far as its policy helped to stimulate and extend the spirit of rebellion. To this three or four things contributed. First, the Defence Act, passed two or three years ago, against which the present writer was one of the few to raise a protest. By that Act every eligible citizen may be compelled to bear arms in a war which he believes to be unjust. That is bad enough even in a country or nation which consists only of one race; it is unjust and suicidal in a country of diverse races, with other European powers established on its borders, and in which, consequently, with a migratory population, brother may be called upon to fight against brother or father against son. As a matter of fact, the Defence Act broke in the Government's hands in the early stages of the war. They found they could not enforce it in large parts of the Transvaal and the Orange Free State. They fell back, partly, on the voluntary principle, and announced that only volunteers would be asked to serve in the expedition to German South-West Africa. But the mischief had been done. Indeed, many of the Dutch people awoke for the first time to the fact that they were liable to be commandeered for service outside the Union. They were willing, they said, to defend the Union if it were attacked, but they were not willing to enter on an aggressive expedition outside the Union.

Second, the message from the Imperial Government to the Union Government on the outbreak of war left much to be desired. That message has never been published, but, according to well-informed authorities, its substance was as follows: "Occupy German South-West Africa. If you do not do so we shall employ Indian troops for the purpose." No wise statesman who knew anything about the political conditions of South Africa would have sent a message of that sort. It forced the hands of the Government when they ought not to have been forced, and it forced them on a point on which the South African mind is peculiarly sensitive—the use of coloured troops. How could it be expected that a people with whom the Imperial Government was at war only twelve years ago, and whose Governments in the two Republics they had swept away, would unitedly and enthusiastically respond to the British proposal for an aggressive expedition on a neighbouring Power! Far wiser would it have been to have said: "Defend the Union territories at all costs. Keep your people loyal and united, and do the best you can for us." But the Union Government gave way, and disaffection spread.

Third, no adequate steps were taken to keep the people united on a common policy. On the outbreak of war the Government consulted both the leaders of the Opposition and the leaders of the Labour Party, but they did not consult the leaders of the dissentient section of their own party. Personal jealousy and personal bitterness is said to have been the cause of this, but whatever the cause, the omission was a fatal blunder. The dissentients felt themselves ignored on a question of life and death, and many of them became either passive resisters or active rebels—with sad results, leaving no end of bitterness behind.

The general question of the expediency of the expedition to German South-West Africa it is now perhaps futile to discuss. The only adequate reason given for it was that the wireless station at Windhuk was sending messages through Togoland to Berlin, which meant danger to our shipping. But with the destruction of the wireless station in Togoland that danger has passed away. The expedition will mean a great sacrifice of life, and there are many who think that the energy, treasure, and life required could have been far more usefully expended in sending contingents of volunteers to Europe, along with Australia and Canada, and limiting our own direct efforts to the defence of the border. That policy would have conciliated many of the dissentients, and so have kept the country practically united, with the exception, perhaps, of a few unscrupulous and treacherous firebrands of the Maritz type. I notice that Canon Scott Holland, in The Commonwealth, urges that the German colonies taken by us during the war "will have to go back at the close of the war, if we are to keep our hands clean." If this is the general feeling in Liberal and Government circles in England what is the use wasting valuable human lives in the sandy deserts of German South-West Africa? I notice that General Botha, also, has declared himself against annexation.

On the general question of the relation of the war to religion, feeling here seems to be much the same as in England, save that there is a considerable body of neutral and lukewarm opinion here, chiefly Dutch. In public utterances of the clergy on the question I have seen no reference to the deeper causes of war such as are so truly set forth in the fourth chapter of the Epistle of James. I have looked in vain through the published reports of the intercessory services here for any hint as to the relation of Christian theology and ethics to the crime of war, and to the great questions of Arbitration, International Law, and the co-operation and fellowship of the nations as a preventive of the evil. There has been little or no sign of penitence and humiliation at the thought of our complicity in building up the huge powder-magazine, the explosion of which has now produced such terrible results; no sign of shame at the thought of our share of guilt—not, indeed, so large as that of most other nations—in so complacently allowing the evil conditions which made the catastrophe possible, and which ultimately produced it.

The war and the rebellion combined have put a stop to nearly all progressive social and educational movements here, but I notice that our minister in Johannesburg, along with a few other educational and social workers, has succeeded in establishing a South African Workers' Educational Association there which is likely to do excellent work. Most of the charitable societies and the Churches, including our own, have organised work parties for the supply of garments and comforts for the Belgians, for the men at the front, or for the relief of distress; a volunteer South African Ambulance party, fully staffed, which includes one well-known Quaker—the editor of The South African Quarterly—has left for France; and Dr. Emile Vollet, the Liberal medical missionary in Basutoland, has left with his sixteen year old son to offer his services to his country. The sympathy with Belgium is universal.

BELGIAN REFUGEES IN HOLLAND.

LETTERS FROM MISS KNAPPERT.

WE must all of us feel an almost personal gratitude to the Dutch for the way in which they have answered the call of humanity, and have done more than has been possible for us to do on behalf of exiled Belgium. And so, I think, readers of THE INQUIRER will be interested in the following extracts from letters I have lately received from Miss Emilie Knappert, who is personally known to so many of them.

I had heard of Miss Knappert's work in Leiden, where she superintended the welcoming of some 170 refugees, who were housed in the "Volkshuis"—Holland's pioneer University Settlement—and I wrote to ask her if she could make any use of private help from England. She replied saying that either money or clothes would be most welcome, as the need far exceeded their means of dealing with it, and I then sent her some money I had collected, while the sewing circle connected with our chapel sent a good sized parcel of clothes; underclothing is what is most needed, and we are hoping soon to send her a fresh instalment through the agency of Mr. E. Milner, 22, New Street Square, London, E.C., who undertakes to forward parcels to any part of Holland for the distressed Belgians.

On December 21, she wrote as follows:

"Leidsche Volkshuis."

"I got the money on Thursday morning. Now listen to what I am going to do. I must first of all get board for a mother and babe of five weeks old, a little Albert whom I had in the Volkshuis, and who are not well enough taken care of at present. He is a healthy, strong babe, one of the many bonny children that will have to build up Belgium again. Then I ordered underclothing, part of which was ready made, another part cut out to give out for sewing to unemployed women between Christmas and the New Year. I take J—— and M—— to the South to distribute the garments our selves in connection with the Committee, either of Rosendaal or —, and I promised J—— and M—— to go with them as far as the frontier, when our work was done, to see the way in which our neutral country has to guard its borders. I think I can use money, a great deal of money, in the right way. . . . What is wanted very badly is underclothing. My people, those of the Volkshuis, all decent working people, had hardly anything but what they wore. They got garments at once, but things wear out and want to be replaced; but it is a fact that in the Southern provinces thousands and thousands have got no change of garments up to this moment. You must not pity Holland for what it suffers. Would it not be unbearable if it did not? We are going to have a nice feast on Saturday with the thirty-two Belgians who were in the Volkshuis and are still in Leiden. . . . How we are all longing for a decisive victory in France and Flanders. One does not dare to think of the life in the trenches. For the sake of all that matters, the Allied Forces must win. . . . For us the nicest way to get the money is by postal order."

Later I received the following:—

January 1, 1915.

"Last Wednesday I went to Rosendaal with over 250 pieces of underclothing, taking F—— and M—— with me. The local Committee has been very careful in selecting the families. Hundreds of skilled labourers and their families in the first days of October, have come in with some hundred francs, have hired a room, spent all their cash on food, and can't think of buying clothes. These people don't appeal to the imagination as the thousands in the camps do; but they are, perhaps, more miserable than these are. It was such a pleasure to see how the men and women enjoyed the prospect of putting on clean linen. We distributed it ourselves; we had not half enough. Just now I got a letter from a friend to tell me that a big highly respectable family has been warned too late, whether I might be able to help still. Since the garments of Miss Ogden have come, I can, at least, send for the children. There is another category of people who came and want help as badly, those boarded out among the peasants. We could help some of them; but, of course, much more is needed. I am very happy to distribute it. I took the children to the frontier. It gives one an uneasy feeling to realise how very, very near the Germans are. What wonderful things any but natural frontiers are. Six steps from where we were, and our chauffeur was a prisoner, as, indeed, he once was. The Prussian flag at one side, and at five yards nearer the Dutch flag. And for thousands of creatures, this means all the difference between slavery and freedom, between actual starvation and maintenance, between peril of death and safety. There was one old soul, her husband blind and lame, and "eating for two," whom I asked whether she was all right in the farm where she was boarded out with her people. "Yes," says she, "I know them for I took my milk and cheese from them." The village where she lives and the one where she now stays are at five minutes distance, and she is in exile at ten minutes distance from her home. This old woman does not dare to go to look after her cottage at the other side of the border line. I took F— and M— to one of our biggest shelters for refugees, an enormous factory for beet-root sugar. They are kept there perfectly warm and clean and well fed. But it is such a miserable thing to see 600 human beings, and more, heaped up together, without practically any privacy. Last week the only boy of our French minister went off to France,—he is just 19. The father gave such an excellent sermon at Christmas. Our other French minister, a young married man, has been at the front since August."

And again, nearly a month later, she writes as follows:—

"Leiden, January 27, 1915.

"These new-born Belgians, in what awful sense the spes patriae, ask a good deal of care and money, since the savings of skilled labour have gone, and these people cannot find work here. They are in need of food, and funds are badly wanted. Miss Ogden's garments and the clothes I bought from your money went to them, and since I told them English friends promised more help if need be, they appealed for more to me, just a month after my first help. Is there any chance that you can afford more funds? In this case there is neither over-lapping nor overdoing."

Money can be sent by Post Office order direct to Miss Knappert, or I should be pleased to collect and acknowledge any small sums under £1 that any one could spare from other claims.

AMERICAN UNITARIAN SUNDAY SCHOOLS.

BELGIAN CHILDREN'S FUND.

THE Unitarian Sunday Schools in the United States have been contributing their cents and dollars to a Belgian Children's Relief Fund. The Rev. William I. Lawrence, President of the Unitarian Sunday School Society, Boston, Mass., has been most assiduous in his efforts to encourage the scholars to take an interest in, and show their practical sympathy with the homeless children of Belgium. Collections were made in a large number of Unitarian Sunday Schools, and the sum of $700 was forwarded to the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie at Essex Hall, and received by him a few days ago. Mr. Lawrence, in his letter, states that it is desired that the money be used in providing comforts and cheer for poor Belgian children in England and in Holland. Mr. Ion Pritchard, the President of the Sunday School Association, will give advice and assistance in devising ways and means of making the wisest and best use of the money; and he has kindly consented to act as custodian and paymaster of the Fund raised by the American Sunday Schools. It should be added that in addition to their gifts of money, shipments of food and clothing have been forwarded to Belgium and Holland by the young people connected with the Unitarian Sunday Schools in the United States. These expressions of kindness and goodwill are warmly appreciated by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and the Sunday School Association. The Belgian children will rejoice when they learn what has been done by their friends across the Atlantic Ocean.

MIDDAY SERVICES AT ESSEX HALL.

THE London Unitarian ministers at a recent meeting appointed a small Subcommittee, with the Rev. J. Arthur Pearson as Secretary, to organise, by way of experiment, a few Lenten Midday Services at Essex Hall. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association undertook to pay the working expenses. The Services will be held from 1.15 to 1.50 on the following Wednesdays: March 10, 17, 24, 31. There will be a brief Organ Recital at 1.10. The Addresses will be given by Rev. Dr. Drummond (of Oxford), Rev. Henry Gow (of Hampstead), Rev. Joseph Wood (late of Birmingham), Rev. J. H. Weatherall (of Kensington). The invitation states "Professional and Business Men are Specially Invited"; but the services will, of course, be open to any one who can make it convenient to attend.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Belfast.—The Annual Meeting of the Sunday School of the First Presbyterian Church was held in the Central Hall on February 19. Although sixty-two scholars had earned prizes for good conduct and regular attendance during the past year, they had, without exception, decided to forgo the value of their book prizes in order that the money might be devoted to some one or other of the funds appealing for help. As it had been decided to send a substantial sum to the Queen's "Work for Women" Fund, the officials of the latter sent to each of the prize-winners an appropriate certificate, specially designed, to mark such acts of self-denial on the part of Sunday School scholars. These certificates were handed to the sixty-two young people by the Rev. H. J. Rossington, who hoped that they might be treasured up, and prove a source of pleasure long after the present war was over. Subsequently, on behalf of a large number of subscribers in the congregation and beyond its borders, a presentation was made to Mr. James M. Williams, who had worked for nearly thirty years in the Sunday School, and is now retiring from the post of Superintendent.

Burnley.—The Trafalgar Street Unitarian Church has lost an old and valued member by the death of Mr. James Halstead, aged 71, which occurred on February 11. The funeral was attended by a large number of friends, the service being conducted by the Rev. A. Cobden Smith. At the memorial service, which was held on February 21, Mr. John S. Mackie, President of the Church, and a friend of Mr. Halstead's for fifty years, delivered an address, in the course of which he referred to Mr. Halstead's deep interest in everything which concerned his fellow-men, his sympathy with those who wished to extend the bounds of freedom, his advocacy of improved educational facilities, the temperance cause, and the liberal religious movement, to which he was attracted by the writings of Theodore Parker. He entered with zest into the work of Church and Sunday School, in connection with which he held many offices, performing the duties he so willingly took up with the thoroughness and rectitude which specially characterised all his actions. His benefactions were many, but he was extremely modest and unostentatious, and preferred to do good by stealth. Among his numerous activities he found time to help in the compilation of the collection of hymns which are used at the Trafalgar Street Church on special occasions, and he also represented the Church for some time on the general committee of the North and East Lancashire Unitarian Mission.

Chowbent.—On Sunday evening, February 14, a Special Musical Service was conducted at Chowbent Unitarian Chapel, consisting of selections from the 'Elijah,' which were admirably rendered by the full choir, under the direction of the organist and choir master (Mr. Thomas Martin, F.R.C.O.). The brief introductory Service was conducted by the Minister, the Rev. J. J. Wright. The collections, for the Chapel Wardens' Fund, amounted to over £8.

Hale.—The proceeds of a Social Evening arranged by the elder girls of the Sunday School, amounting to £4 10s., have been forwarded to the British Unitarian Women's League Fund for Belgians in Holland.

London: Essex Hall.—About two hundred children, belonging to upwards of twenty Unitarian congregations and Sunday schools, have been made happy by a gift of toys recently sent over from Japan by the Rev. S. Uchigesaki on behalf of the Unitarians of Tokyo. The Japanese, as is well known, excel in the art of making beautiful and artistic toys, which are varied in design and brilliant in colouring, and the dolls and chickens, cardboard aeroplanes and pistols, picture-puzzles and windmills contained in the four closely packed and neatly made boxes which arrived at Essex Hall early in January, had been fashioned with much deftness and ingenuity. The children in various parts of England and Ireland, to whom the toys were given, each received a little note explaining that they had been sent as an expression of sympathy and goodwill in this time of national crisis, and the committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association has sent a cordial letter of thanks to Mr. Uchigesaki.

Sheffield.—The report read at the Annual Meeting of the Upper Chapel recently showed that thirty-eight of the young men connected with the Chapel or School, including the organist (Mr. Arnold Bagshaw), had joined the colours; while the United Sewing Meeting of the Sheffield Unitarian congregations, assisted by the Clothing Guild, had dispatched 1,850 garments to the Army and Navy, mine sweepers, base hospital, Belgian refugees, &c. The congregation had taken and furnished a large house and two cottages for the reception of refugees, towards which about £100 had been received in donations, besides gifts of furniture, and over £7 a week was being contributed. Appreciative reference was made in the report to the splendid service of the Bramley family to the Church, the office of Secretary having been held by the late Mr. Edward Bramley (Town Clerk) from 1854 to 1865. Mr. Herbert Bramley (Town Clerke from 1865 to 1885); then, after an interval of eight years, Mr. Edward Bramley was appointed in 1893, his brother (Mr. Henry R. Bramley) being associated with him in 1904, since which time they had acted as joint honorary secretaries, a position from which they were now retiring. A resolution thanking them for their faithful services, expressing regret at their resignation, and congratulating the family on their fine record of fifty-three years' service in the secretarial office, was warmly adopted. A cordial vote of appreciation of the services of the Minister, the Rev. C. J. Street, and of the new Assistant Minister (the Rev. J. W. Lee) was passed unanimously.

Stockton-on-Tees.—At the Annual Meeting of the members of the Church, held on Tuesday, February 23, satisfactory reports were given by the Secretary and Treasurer, showing an increase during the past year of thirty-two new members, and a substantial rise in the year's subscription list and in the weekly collections. An encouraging report of the Sunday School was also given. The Rev. Arthur Scruton has accepted a unanimous and hearty invitation to continue his ministry in the Church. A presentation has been made to Miss M. S. Walton, who has resigned the Secretaryship of the Sunday School owing to her appointment as Treasurer of the Church.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

THE LATE JOSHUA ROWNTREE.

A man of vision yet with a sane and practical mind, the breadth of view born of wide sympathies and understanding, and a wonderful capacity for entering into the lives of others, no matter what their class or calling, Mr. Joshua Rowntree will be mourned by a wide circle of friends both in England and the countries overseas where he was also known and honoured. His life seems to have been spent almost entirely in the service of others, and he was, of course, connected intimately with all the forward and progressive activities of the Society of Friends. He was for four years the editor of The Friend, which last week devoted a good deal of space to a record of his life, and a frequent contributor to other Quaker journals. Mr. Rowntree gave unwavering support to the Adult School, Co-operative Holidays, Summer Schools, Temperance and Peace movements; and for more than thirty years his home at Scarborough was the natural meeting place for workers on these lines. By many he will be chiefly remembered for the time and labour he devoted, together with his brother-in-law, Mr. John Edward Ellis, to the Anti-Opium movement, and his book on this subject, entitled 'The Imperial Drug Trade.'

BIRD SENTINELS.

The pheasant's ear is evidently capable of receiving impressions from sound waves that the human ear cannot respond to. Several correspondents have written to The Times stating that there was considerable agitation among the pheasants in different parts of the country on January 24, the day of the battle in the North Sea; and Canon Rawnsley, who has been making investigations, confirms what they say. In many places in Yorkshire, Cumberland, Cheshire, and Lincolnshire, the birds were obviously excited, and crowed and "churrked," flying high up into the air. The nearest approach to the sound of the guns being heard far inland was a curious "soughing" in the ear, heard at Risplith, near Ripon. Just as parrots in the trenches, or on the Eiffel Tower, can report the sound of the Gnome engine in the air, twenty minutes before the aeroplane is visible, so these birds are apparently able to act as sentinels right across England to give warning of heavy gun firing in the North Sea.

THE ONE THING LACKING.

A timely protest was made in the last number of The Women's Industrial News which many of us might well take to heart in our efforts to improve social conditions. The writer complains that, with our growing love of efficiency and officialdom, we often fail to get into sympathetic touch with those whom we are most anxious to help. "I once overheard two married women of the working class discussing the matrimonial failure of a neighbour," she says. "At the close of the conversation, redolent with that cheerful acceptance of human imperfection, that absence of sex rancour, that instinctive allowance for the element of cruel and unaccountable mischance which plays so large a part in the lives of the poor—these are qualities which more than 'efficiency' should make the opinion of the working man and woman worth considering in matters that vitally concern them—the younger woman, a girl still herself in years, capped the discussion with the remark, 'She didn't study 'im.'"

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.

WE are able to announce this week that we are making preparations to send out another large consignment of drugs and nursing requisites to the Belgian Hospitals. One doctor has written to ask us to help him to put his X-ray apparatus into working order. We have consulted an expert on the subject, and all that is needed will be forwarded to him at once. The letters of thanks which have just come to hand show how eagerly our help is welcomed. They also reveal the urgency of the need. We are keeping pace with it to a certain extent; but all that we can send is absorbed instantly, and the cry is still for more.

* * *

MR. ASQUITH made an important speech in the House of Commons on Monday, in which he defined in guarded language the policy of the Allies in face of the German submarine menace. It has been decided to use the pressure of sea-power in order to isolate Germany. A formal statement on the subject has been prepared and issued by the Government, but the following words of explanatory comment by the Prime Minister sufficiently explain its purport.

In the statement which I have just read out of the retaliatory measures we propose to adopt, the words "blockade" and "contraband" and other technical terms of international law do not occur. And advisedly so. In dealing with an opponent who has openly repudiated all the principles both of law and of humanity, we are not going to allow our efforts to be strangled in a network of juridical niceties. We do not intend to put into operation any measures which we do not think to be effective, and I need not say we shall carefully avoid any measure which would violate the rules either of humanity or of honesty. But, subject to those two conditions, I say, not only to our enemy, but I say it on behalf of the Government, and I hope on behalf of the House of Commons, that under existing conditions there is no form of economic pressure to which we do not consider ourselves entitled to resort. If as a consequence neutrals suffer inconvenience and loss of trade, we regret it, but we beg them to remember that this phase of the war was not initiated by us. We do not propose either to assassinate their seamen or to destroy their goods. What we are doing we do solely in self-defence.

CRITICAL minds in our own and neutral countries have been somewhat exercised by this announcement, because it seems to them on the one hand to savour of "methods of barbarism," and on the other to come dangerously near to trifling with international law. We are, however, quite unable to accept the plea that a virtual blockade of Germany is a crime against humanity. Undoubtedly it means, if it is successful, that the suffering and horror of war will be felt in every German home; but this economic pressure may be the shortest and quickest way of bringing the war to an end, and result in the saving of tens of thousands of human lives. The siege of a whole country is a new and startling operation which has been rendered possible by our naval power; but as an act of war it does not differ essentially from the siege of a great city, except that it will be much less horrible.

ON the side of international law there are several points which may be discussed by subtle and pedantic minds. It must be remembered, however, that international law is not a hard-shell system which admits of no adaptation to meet unprecedented conditions. Mr. Asquith was quite right to rest his case upon a general sense of equity rather than upon technical legality, and in so doing showed himself a great lawyer as well as a great statesman. The one thing that matters is that neutral States should have no ground of complaint against us that their peaceful rights have been unduly infringed. But here we can make our case good by appealing to the balance of advantage. Germany's piratical policy of sinking merchant vessels at sight is a serious menace to all neutral shipping. Any measure which will limit her capacity for destruction is as much in the interest of neutrals as of ourselves.

THIS point of view is likely to assert itself when the first impulses of protest have died away into cool reflection. We do not honour the United States less because she is very sensitive about her rights. Her men of affairs know quite well that American interests will receive every consideration at our hands; nor are they likely to forget that we are only adopting the policy of a virtual blockade, which Lincoln, most just and far-seeing of men, pursued with such effect during the Civil War. The Washington correspondent of The Times reminds us that the final victory of the Union was largely due to the success of that policy. "Yet for a year and more the blockade was too thin to square with the rules of the Declaration of Paris. Washington recognized the fact, and appealed to the tolerance of neutrals. Up to the end the Union policy was extra-legal to the extent of often capturing ships in mid-ocean."

In the noble peroration to his speech Mr. Asquith uttered a word of warning to those who are inclined to concentrate their energies at the present moment upon discussing terms of peace.

I hear sometimes whispers [he said], hardly more than whispers, of possible terms of peace. Peace is the greatest human good, but this is not the time to talk of peace. Those who talk of peace, however excellent their intentions, are in my judgment victims, I will not say of wanton, but of grievous self-delusion. Just now we are in the stress and tumult of a tempest which is shaking the foundations of the earth. The time to talk of peace is when the great tasks in which we and our Allies embarked on the long and stormy voyage are within sight of accomplishment.

However unwilling many people of pacific temper may be to accept them, we believe that these words are strictly true. The terms of peace, when we are able to frame them, must depend upon the issues of the war. They will also have to conform in many respects to the wishes of Allies who are very different in political temperament from ourselves. We cannot make a more fatal mistake either in the criticism of the war while it is in progress, or in the definition of the terms of peace at its close, than to regard ourselves as the predominant partner, whose will must prevail.

THE chief business of non-combatants at home, who are anxious to work for the future, is not to frame fancy schemes of their own, but to engage in the serious work of political education. As a nation we are very deficient in knowledge of the history of other countries, and easily fall into the mistake of supposing that freedom and democratic control and other familiar phrases in our political vocabulary have precisely the same value for them as for ourselves. For this reason we welcome most heartily the programme issued by the Council for the Study of International Relations, which appears in our present issue. The object which it has in view is defined in the following statement:—

The immediate aim should be to assist people to understand something of the issues raised by the war, the master ideas which lie at the foundation of our national life, the history of Europe, the philosophies behind policies, and the economic and ethical problems which the war will bequeath to the world. Beyond this is the larger task of education in true feeling and insight, and the reconstruction, not merely of the material fabric of civilisation, but also of its moral and spiritual basis.

THIS is a large programme. Some people who are anxious for measures made to their own pattern will regard it as much too vague. But that is its advantage. It is free from the vice of the idealist, who cuts himself loose from history, and talks to us in terms of the Kingdom of Heaven before he has mastered the elementary facts of our life upon earth. It is also free from any trace of partisanship. No one can regard the distinguished men who form the council as Adullamites, who have fallen out with the Government, and find a sad pleasure in their isolation from a naughty world. Every intelligent citizen can take part in its work without feeling that he is either damaging the integrity of his own conscience, or weakening by a single syllable of moody criticism the union and strength by which alone we can prevail.

* * *

THE serious labour troubles on the Clyde and elsewhere are, we hope, a thing of the past. They ought never to have occurred. The sulky terms upon which the Clyde workers are said to have resumed work do little credit to their patriotism or their self-respect. Probably they were meant to save their face, and were never intended to be enforced. It is unthinkable that at a time of grave emergency, when thousands of their comrades are fighting in the trenches, they will deliberately refuse to work overtime or refrain from putting their full strength into their work. The menacing situation called forth an impassioned speech from Mr. Lloyd George at Bangor last Sunday, in which he emphasised the grim seriousness of the war, and announced that the Government might find it necessary to introduce Compulsory Arbitration, a policy to which organised labour has been strongly opposed hitherto.

THE other important point in Mr. Lloyd George's speech was his statement about the drink problem. He spoke, evidently with a grave sense of responsibility, of the way in which industrial efficiency is being impaired in armaments works by the lure of drink. "Drink," he said, "is doing us more damage in the war than all the German submarines put together." Then after a cordial reference to the heroic measures adopted by Russia and France to combat the evil, he continued:—

We do not propose anything so drastic as that. We are essentially moderate men. But we are armed with full powers for the defence of the realm. We are approaching it, I do not mind telling you, for the moment not from the point of view of people who have been considering this as a social problem—we are approaching it purely from the point of view of those works. We have got great powers to deal with drink, and we mean to use them. We shall use them in a spirit of moderation, we shall use them discreetly, we shall use them wisely, but we shall use them quite fearlessly, and I have no doubt that as the country's needs demand it the country will support our action, and will allow no indulgence of that kind to interfere with its prospects in this terrible war which has been thrust upon us.

* * *

WE are glad to have the support of the Dean of Durham in the view which we expressed last week that the question whether the clergy should enlist is to be decided not by an appeal to their spiritual rank, but by considerations of expediency. The position seems to us so important as a matter of principle, that we venture to state it again in his words. "Every Christian, clerical or lay," he writes, "is a member of an international, because a spiritual, society, the Church of Christ, and the moral obligations implicit in that character are one and the same for officials and non-officials in that society. There can, I apprehend, be no essential difference between patriotic duty in the case of the clergyman and in that of the layman; but there are cogent reasons of expediency which may fairly be urged against the clergy taking part as actual combatants even in a war so righteous as this which we are now waging."

It is clear that when the matter is approached from this point of view all the clergy will not act in the same way, in spite of the attempt of the bishops to impose a uniform standard upon them. Many will be influenced by their own temperament, or the special circumstances in which they are placed. Thus the Rev. F. E. Powell writes as follows in The Westminster Gazette:—

When I became a clergyman I did not throw off the duties which belong to me as a man. And if I allow myself to benefit by that which my brethren are obtaining for me without being ready and willing, if able and if necessity demands, to co-operate with them, I am not worthy of my manhood. Had I not been too old I should have defied all ecclesiastical authority, convention, censure, and penalties, and should have taken my stand with my brothers in defence of honour, liberty, and nationality. Unless I was thus minded I could never have desired, let alone asked, a single individual to fight my battles for me.

We confess that we have keen sympathy with Mr. Powell's position. We may add as a further word of comment upon the whole discussion that it is stated that 20,000 priests, members of religious orders and seminarists, are serving in the French Army, and among them there are three bishops.

THE NATION AND ITS BURDEN.

WE have carried the burden of the War for more than six months, and it is beginning to press heavily upon our shoulders. We knew all along that it must be so. We never had any illusions about the terrific nature of the task which we had undertaken. We saw clearly that there must be poverty, suffering, and sorrow, far beyond our power to estimate, and we were prepared to accept our share of it cheerfully for the sake of our country. For this reason there was a singular absence of grumbling or of boastfulness. Party cries were hushed; the spirit of faction ceased to work; and all private interests were postponed at the bidding of the public need. We were one people, bearing the yoke of a common duty, conscious of a divine mission to go forth as protectors of the weak and defenders of the right.

Those first days and weeks, in spite of their terror, will live in the memory of many people as a time of transfiguration. It was good to feel the mighty stirrings of national life moving in our hearts, and under the impulse of dedication and self-sacrifice for the common cause to lose the habits of the critic and the partisan. Our religious life, rent and divided by sectarianism, needed this sense of a deeper unity. Our political life, dominated by the interests of class and party, needed this cleansing discipline of common aims. And all of us, who have lived in small groups and fought hard for our own limited point of view in thought and action, needed to be recalled to a more catholic temper and to the largeness and dignity of the common life.

But the days of cleansing vision, in which we braced ourselves to endure hardness, have passed. How is it with us now? The things which we discussed as possibilities have actually happened. We are, many of us, poorer than we were, with the prospect in a short time of being much poorer still. The cost of living has gone up to an extent which will be felt severely by all slender incomes. The tax-collector has made his first heavy demand for the expenses of the war. Can we stand it all without grumbling? Have we the strength to crush down the baser instincts of self-interest when they begin to stir again in our hearts? Are the propensities of the fault-finder, which so often mask themselves under more virtuous names, breaking loose from the silence and restraint which we had imposed upon them? It is right that we should put these questions to ourselves and to all our fellow-citizens, lest having begun well any of us should fall away into the weakness of divided counsels, or the guilt of loving ourselves better than we love our country.

The labour troubles, which have been a cause of grave anxiety lately, have come as an unpleasant reminder that with some people patriotism and the common good do not after all come first. The demand for higher wages may be legitimate in view of higher profits in certain trades—that is a matter which requires expert knowledge for its discussion. To carry this demand to the point of ceasing work, when idleness means the weakening of our powers of resistance and attack, is to take sides with the enemy. The men on the Clyde would, no doubt, resent this description of their action. They would plead that they have only resorted to the normal method of fighting the masters, and that in any case they have a perfect right to do what they like. But at bottom their action does mean this, that their money is more important in their eyes than the safety of the country. It is also an attempt to make good the claim that the skilled wage-earner ought to bear as little as possible of the burden and expense of the war.

The time has come when it is incumbent upon all sections of the population to realise that the war, even when we have brought it to a triumphant close, is going to leave us poorer than we were. The rise in the price of food has already appeared as a danger signal. We may have to face many years of scarcity and hardship. We shall have to be more frugal in our habits, and reduce our needs to the limits of a smaller income. For people who live close to the margin of subsistence there must be large consideration; but others, skilled artisans, shop-keepers, professional men, the captains of industry and commerce, must all shoulder the burden according to their ability, and pay their contribution as one of the elementary duties of citizenship. For this reason we do not think that it is possible to uphold the principle, though it receives powerful support in some quarters, that the worker has a claim to such an increase of wages as will make his position not less advantageous than it was at the beginning of the war. Apart from the equity of this claim that the wage-earner alone is entitled not to suffer from the tension and strain which have been placed upon the whole life of the country, we cannot overlook the demoralising effect of a constant effort to look after an improvement in wages at a time when personal interests ought to be surrendered to the utmost for higher ends.

To all grumblers and shirkers, and to every man, be he rich or poor, who is inclined to think more of his own money or comfort than of the spiritual issues of the present struggle, and thus to become a pensioner upon the courage and loyalty of other people, we would commend the words of Thomas Paine which appeared in our column of 'Good Thoughts' last week: "What we obtain too cheap, we esteem too lightly; it is dearness only that gives anything its value. Heaven knows how to put a proper price upon its goods; and it would be strange, indeed, if so celestial an article as freedom should not be highly rated."

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

Be calm in arguing; for fierceness makes Error a fault, and truth discourtesy. Why should I feel another man's mistakes More than his fickleness or poverty? In love I should; but anger is not love, Nor wisdom neither; therefore gently move. GEORGE HERBERT.

THE CHARACTER OF JOHN SMITH, THE CAMBRIDGE PLATONIST.

AND let me say thus much, that he was far from that Spirit of devouring zeal that now too much rages. He would rather have been consumed in the service of men, than have called for fire down from heaven, as Elijah did, to consume them. And, therefore, though Elijah excelled him in this, that he ascended up to heaven in a fiery chariot, yet herein, I may say, he was above the spirit of Elijah, that he called for no fire to descend from heaven upon men ; but the fire of divine love that might burn up all their hatreds, roughness, and cruelty to each other. But as for benignity of mind and Christian kindness, everybody that knew him will remember that he ever had their names in his mouth, and I assure them they were no less in his heart and life ; as knowing that without these truth itself is in a faction, and Christ is drawn into a party. And this graciousness of spirit was the more remarkable in him, because he was of a temper naturally hot and choleric, as the greatest minds most commonly are. He was wiser than to let any anger rest in his bosom ; much less did he suffer it to burn and boil till it was turned into gall and bitterness ; and least of all would he endure that any passion should lodge in him, till it was become a cankered malice and black hatred, which men in these days can scarce hide, but let it appear in their countenance and in their carriage towards others. If he was at any time moved unto anger, it was but a sudden flushing in his face, and it did as soon vanish as arise ; and it used to arise upon no such occasions as I now speak of. No, whensoever he look'd upon the fierce and consuming fires that were in men's souls, it made him sad, not angry ; and it was his constant endeavour to inspire mens' souls with more benign and kindly heats, that they might warm but not scorch their Brethren. And from this Spirit, together with the rest of Christian Graces that were in him, there did result a great Serenity, Quiet and Tranquility in his Soul, which dwelt so much above that it was not shaken with any of those Tempests and Storms which use to unsettle more low and abject minds.—From a sermon preached by Dr. Simon Patrick at the funeral of Mr. John Smith at Cambridge in 1652.

O LORD, let that become possible to me by Thy grace which by nature seems impossible to me. Thou knowest that I am able to suffer but little, and that I am quickly cast down when a slight adversity ariseth. For Thy Name's sake let every ordeal of Trouble and Adversity become grateful and acceptable unto me ; for to be troubled for Thy sake is very wholesome for my soul. Amen.

QUESTIONS AT ISSUE.

AFTER THE WAR.

"It is not too soon to begin to think out the new situation which will arise at the close of the war.....We shall be faced with a tremendous task of reconstruction.....Now is the time to speak of this thing, to work for it, to pray for it."—From the Manifesto of the Religious Society of Friends.

WE do not define a bootmaker as a man who refrains from destroying boots, nor a shipbuilder as one who dislikes the process of breaking up ships. And the seventh beatitude does not read : "Blessed are those who refrain from war, who hate it and keep out of it." Something less negative than this earns the blessing : Give us the man who makes peace, lays the foundations, and builds the structure of peace.

Granted this definition, we must at once admit that there is a place in time of strife and bloodshed for this peace-maker—not for the man who weeps and wrings his hands and runs away, but for him whose thoughts look out beyond the horror and misery, who sees more than the war's immediate interest and ugliness, builds his dream-kingdom in the realm of the ideal, and sets about, then and there, to fashion and to fix in their proper places the first stones of the construction upon earth.

This is no new way of life, for darkness has ever been the nurse of enlightened and prophetic souls. Nor is it an idle and foolish thing to attempt, for "here in this poor, miserable, hampered, despicable Actual, wherein thou even now standest, here or nowhere," says Carlyle, "is thy Ideal ; work it out therefrom : and working, believe, live, be free." And let us disarm criticism by disclaiming a "stop-the-war-at-any-price" attitude. It is quite possible for a non-combatant to be in favour of prosecuting this war, and to occupy his mind with forward-looking thoughts. Nay, it is even possible for the fighters themselves. Readers may have noticed that in a popular weekly's competition for the best suggested terms of peace special prizes are offered for army and navy men ; and the present writer has ample evidence in letters from men with the Forces that such thoughts are indeed occupying their minds. Surely the nation as a whole will carry out its task with greater earnestness and success if we all keep well in mind the purpose for which we are fighting ; if we focus our attention, often, upon the kind of peace that is to be built on the ground cleared by our present action, just as one delves with greater zeal in his garden if he keeps in mind the thought of the roses that are to grow just there—keeps roses in his heart, as the gracious Dean suggests.

Enough, then, by way of defence for the forward-looking thought in time of war. It is gratifying to find that at last it is occupying the minds of press-writers and publicists in many places, and that the call of the Friends' Manifesto is at last meeting with widespread response. The present article is by way of provoking discussion in the columns of

THE INQUIRER ; let us, therefore, make a brief and very general survey of the ground embraced in the forward look, and let each field of possible action be represented by a typical idealist.

Firstly, there is the man who holds that an abiding peace will follow after this war because men are now seeing for themselves all the ugliness and misery of the actual results of modern warfare ; he feels that men must realize its horror, that we needs must hate the vilest when we see it, and proclaims in the Press and elsewhere, "This war will end war." Or he holds that all the parties concerned will suffer mightily from exhaustion (in men and money), and this to such an extent that all will rise and cry, "Never again !" This is not a very helpful contribution to the subject : a man in the "ring" who is struck violently and often may feel sore, may lose all the prize-money, and may suffer from exhaustion ; but he certainly does not rise with an altruistic sigh from the sawdust and say, "I am purged of the spirit of fighting ; henceforth write me down a lover of peace." Assuredly an abiding peace will come by no reaction of this kind, and by no short cut, but only after years of the united thought and toil of all those who love to work for the coming of that life which only peace can yield.

And there is the man with the map ; who drafts the new Europe on the wall of his room ; who assures you to-day that "of course Alsace and Lorraine must go to France, and Poland to Russia" ; but next week, having read further in history meanwhile, veers round and parcels out those lands according to a new scheme. His motto should be, "Read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest." He may cultivate thus a new respect for diplomats and statesmen, and he may decide at last that, apart from the fleeting pleasures of the game of territorial jigsaw, not details, but broad principles of action in such matters are his most useful concern.

Or, again, there is the pacifist of the vague ideas. "We must establish a United States of Europe, and settle all disputes by arbitration. We could do it to-morrow if we only made up our minds." Ah ! "your 'if' is the only peacemaker," if we can make its condition a fact. But how to make up the mind of Europe to this happy desire is a problem, and we may have to advance by easier stages.

We pass to the men of the clear-cut remedies. And here we tread on holy ground. Men of ripe wisdom, men of knowledge and experience, good Europeans and sound thinkers, have occupied this position ; have even, in these few short months, banded themselves in groups on the basis of certain definite claims to be made at the close of the War—certain demands which, at the proper moment, they intend to lay before the conference appointed to discuss the Peace Treaty, their aim being, in the meantime, to secure for their programme the backing of a strong public opinion, which they are endeavouring to encourage by lectures, pamphlets, &c. Foremost, perhaps, among these are the founders of the "Union of Democratic Control,"*

* King's Chambers, Portugal Street, London, W.C.

who hold that if we, a sovereign people, are to have any voice whatever in the settlement, we must now formulate and organise the expression of our will with regard to certain definite principles of action. The four cardinal points in their policy are as follows:—

(1) No Province shall be transferred from one Government to another without the consent, by plebiscite, of the population of such Province.

(2) Democratic control of foreign policy.

(3) Direction of British foreign policy towards establishing a true Concert of Europe and setting up an International Council.

(4) Drastic reduction of armaments by all the belligerents, general nationalisation of manufacture of armaments, and control of their export and import.

Branches of this Society have been established in many towns in the United Kingdom, and vigorous work is being done.

The "Civil Union," which was already in being for about a year before the outbreak of the war, was soon absorbed by the "Union of Democratic Control"; but a minority of its members remaining unabsorbed have formed the "League of International Right,"* whose leading characteristic in the meantime is that, like the former "Civil Union," they embody their proposals in a Petition to the Prime Minister, pleading, with much cogency, that the British Government should give its weight to securing, at the close of the war, those terms involved in the conception of public right to which Mr. Asquith himself subscribed in his Dublin speech, viz.:—

(1) The recognition of the claims of nationality.

(2) The establishment of a real European partnership.

(3) The drastic reduction of armaments.

Readers who are interested in this type of propaganda will find further material for consideration in the programmes submitted by the various Socialist organisations in Britain, America, Denmark, Russia, &c. A useful review of these is to be found in The Labour Leader for Thursday, January 7; and it will be noticed that, in addition to the terms referred to above, support is asked for a number of very debatable claims, such as the abolition of secret diplomacy, root-and-branch democratisation of every European nation (including the recognition of women's claims), and even the "elimination of all unearned income"!

Now, apart from the multitudinous difficulties that would lie before us in any attempt to achieve all these and other sweeping reforms, we must be prepared to deal with the man of the more meditative type who is chary of being urged into precipitate action according to a detailed programme. He cannot agree on all the points advanced; he sees a weakness here, a flaw there; he wants time to think it all out, to read up what has already been done in this direction and in that. It sounds splendid, for example, to say: "We demand the total abolition of secret diplomacy." But our thoughtful friend replies: "Ah, that will not come for many a long day. 'Wings for angels, but feet for men.' Would it not be wise to recognize the inevitability of the continuance of this method for many years to come, and to set about rather raising the standard of the diplomatic service, opening its doors to the suitable man of any class, not ring-fencing it as an aristocratic preserve—in a word, to let the breath of new ideals and the new internationalism enter into and mould our diplomacy?"† Similar criticisms might be launched against all the terms of any programme. And yet if public opinion is to have weight with the statesmen in drafting the Treaty, surely it must be formulated in some more or less precise terms. How far are we to go in laying down detailed terms in our claim?

Pass now to the social or civic reformer, the light of whose ardour the war and all its horrors has failed to extinguish. Foreign policy may fail to attract him, but the forward-looking thought is his intensely. What a field for his activity and resource will be opened up at the close of the war! What earnest discipline of preparation he now requires! There will be the unemployment problem, more urgent than before, including the question of occupation for the permanently disabled home from the Front; demands for the reconstruction of our ideas on national education; the overwhelming need for voluntary social workers in many directions, trained and equipped for their tasks.

And from the social reformer of tomorrow there will come a new cry, for he is noting carefully in these current days the great achievements—the transportation and the feeding of thousands of men, the State control of the railways, the purchase of the sugar supply, the vast organisations for the relief and prevention of distress, the Russian guillotine method of dealing with the drink devil; and he is going to preface all his claims in the days that are before us with the cry, "Away with pessimisms and the old idle talk of impossibility—behold what we can do if we try!"

And more: his comrades with the Forces are awakening to a new outlook on life—new ideas as to what it ought to yield. They are finding in war a field for the realisation of faculties and desires which have been suppressed and deadened in the past—for chivalry, for enterprise, for adventure. Do we imagine that when they return they will settle down easily to the old humdrum life? Is there going to be no demand for longer hours of leisure, and finer occupations for those leisure hours? Are we—we who are proud in having stood in the forefront of the social reformers—are we to anticipate their home-coming and their influence in the Labour field, and give some thought now, before the time comes, to that problem which calls for our utmost wisdom and ability and imagination—how to make peace-life at least as interesting and as full of deep satisfactions as is war-life to thousands of men to-day?

Mr. G. W. E. Russell has pointed out, in speaking of a former war period a hundred years ago, that the very stress of the times brought forth a wonderful revelation of unsuspected creative energy—in religion, politics, literature, painting, sculpture, and social effort. And signs are not wanting to-day of the coming of a new earnestness among us. Where will it lead us? And in the mighty tasks of reconstruction, what part are we to play? No one will say that the field is narrow or unfertile. The only difficulty is to decide at what point we are to enter in. We who are religious teachers will throw our weight into the endeavour to secure new heart-desires; for the problem in its deepest depth is, of course, a religious problem. But the spirit must make itself articulate in action, and already the voices of the past are calling to us; the spirits of Tuckerman, Parker, Channing, John Pounds, Mary Carpenter, and a host of others hover about us as a cloud of witnesses, and the voices call: "O ye who have beheld in us the power of your Faith to inspire for service, raise again the standard, listen again for the 'Reveille' and the new 'Fall In'!"

Swift! spring to your places!
Swift! to the head of the army!
Pioneers! O Pioneers!

THE IMMORALITY OF NON-RESISTANCE.

SIR,—May I remark, with the most engaging gentleness, that Mr. Leonard Doncaster has quite an embarrassing advantage over me? I will be recklessly frank and admit that it has been for me an unavoidable necessity to read my book. His, however, is the privilege of escaping that painful preliminary and of being permitted to criticise the volume without having seen it. He has thus unapproachable qualifications, to which the mere author can lay no possible claim, for dealing authoritatively with its arguments. As he is strong, I beseech him to be merciful. I do not know whether your other correspondent is as impenetrably mailed in triple brass. I rather gather from the letter that it may be so. At any rate, if the hint given in my Preface had been taken, the inaccurately remembered story of Richard Weaver, the converted pugilist, would be found correctly transcribed in William James's 'Varieties of Religious Experi- ence' (p. 281). Another and even more convincing instance of the success of the doctrine of non-resistance is given (p. 359) in a note on the conversion by this method of even "brutish Melanesian cannibals."

The question where non-resistance succeeds and where it fails is worth full discussion, and I hope to deal with it on a future occasion. I intervene here lest correspondents should, like Mr. Doncaster, unassailably equip themselves for criticising me, or should assume that I had not already fully weighed the well-known instances of the triumph of the doctrine before presuming to offer my thoughts to the public.—Yours, &c. FORCE IS NO REMEDY.

SIR,—I believe Mr. Golland to be mistaken as to the result of a policy of non-resistance. The barbarities committed by the Germans in Belgium are the outcome of war and the fierce anger that has arisen from unexpected opposition. It is quite possible that an unarmed nation which offered no resistance would not be invaded, especially in the present day, when every country professes to arm itself solely in self-defence. If it were peaceably annexed there would be little change in the routine of life, and it is doubtful whether the mass of the people would be much worse off. In the long run the government of a country depends upon the character of the population. If England became part of the German Empire the workers of both nations would soon get control of affairs. The greatest hindrance to the growth of democracy and industrial freedom is the military power, and that depends upon the fear of other nations. If all danger of invasion were removed, there would be full scope for social reform. Settlement by force means more reliance upon militarism, and that means more power to the capitalist class. Commercial interests lie at the back of it all.

But supposing all should turn out differently, and hardship and suffering follow, I should still maintain that it cannot be right for those who have received the enlightenment we possess to-day to engage in a war which can only be conducted by a large amount of deceit and by the employment of persons moved by that lust of bloodshed which is sometimes felt even by those who win a Victoria Cross. Not in this way will the Kingdom of Heaven come upon earth. If it is true that the blood of the martyrs is the seed of the Church, is it not likely that the sacrifice of independence by a great nation would lead to the salvation of the world? Jesus belonged to a subject race: a proud, patriotic people, always looking for an opportunity of fighting for liberty. He set before them a different ideal, showing what human life really meant, and pointing to a better way of attaining the dignity and glory of manhood.—Yours, &c., BASIL MARTIN.

OUR MEN IN CAMP AND HOSPITAL.

MANY battalions of the new army are at present training in England but away from home districts, and wounded men who are sent back from the front are frequently for some time in hospital at a distance from their own relations and friends. Anything that can be done to help them, or to give them a friendly greeting, is sure to be appreciated, and our ministers and workers at the Churches near the camps and hospitals are anxious to do all they can. They find, however, a difficulty in getting into touch with our own men, although in some cases letters recommending members of a school or church have been received and acted on. It is, therefore, hoped that ministers, superintendents, and others will send word to the friends near camps and hospitals with the names and full descriptions of any members of the school or church who happen to be there, so that the latter may enjoy the advantages of hospitality or of a friendly visit. In case of any difficulty, the officers of the Association will be very pleased indeed to receive the names of the men, and to pass them on to the nearest friends, if it is possible to make arrangements.—Yours, &c., T. M. CHALMERS,

Hon. Secretary,

FOR THE CHILDREN.

THREE BRAVE MEN.

MIKLUKHO MAKLAY.

MIKLUKHO MAKLAY was an eminent Russian naturalist. He was a brave man too; though to see him, you might not have thought so. For he was a tiny, nervous person, and, to make matters worse, was always in bad health, suffering from malaria which he had contracted in the tropics. Being anxious to study the ways of savages, the Russian Admiralty was persuaded to give him a passage on board a man-of-war which was sailing for the Pacific. He was put ashore on the coast of New Guinea. A sailor was also landed with him, and the two men settled in a hut close to a village of cannibals, where they lived for eighteen months or more on excellent terms with the savages. Maklay's rule was always to be kind and perfectly straightforward with them; never to deceive them, even for scientific purposes, in the slightest detail. This proved his charter of safety and friendship, so that when he came to leave New Guinea the natives made him promise to return. His only opportunity to do so occurred a few years later, when, although seriously ill at the time, he faithfully kept his word.

At another period he was travelling in the Malay peninsula observing the habits of the people there, and obtaining photographs of them. This was not always easy to accomplish, as they thought that when their likeness was taken something must be extracted from them. The traveller's native attendant had only entered his service on condition that his portrait should never be taken. Maklay pledged his word; but he found it very hard to keep it when he saw his servant asleep, and could easily have photographed him without his knowledge. Moreover, this man was a particularly fine representative of his tribe, and his portrait would have been of special value. None the less, the naturalist remained inflexible and refrained from breaking his promise.

FICHTE.

In the middle of the eighteenth century there was born in a village in Saxony a boy who became one of the noblest and most gifted of the German race; his name, Johann (John) Gottlieb Fichte (pronounce Fichté). When but a child he showed an intense appetite for knowledge, while his memory was so strong that after the Sunday service he could repeat the sermon he had just heard the minister preach. Proud of his bright boy, his father, when Johann was seven years old, brought him from the fair in a neighbouring town the famous story of the Unconquerable hero Siegfried. At once the boy became so absorbed in the romantic legend that he could think of nothing else, and his other lessons began to suffer neglect. Realising this he felt ashamed, and determined to get rid of his temptation. To achieve this end cost him a hard struggle and a painful sacrifice, but his courage was equal to the strain. A stream flowed by his home. Seizing a moment when no one was about he flung the little book into the water, and it was carried away by the current. Then he burst into tears. His father and mother soon noticed that the favourite book was missing. By what accident, they asked, had it been lost? The boy would never tell, for he feared that he might not be able to explain what he had done, although he felt it was right. Some time after, his father thought to replace the missing volume with another copy, but Johann begged that it should be given to one of his brothers instead.

When he had grown to manhood Fichte became known as a great thinker and teacher in the universities. About this time Napoleon defeated the Prussians and overran Germany with his armies. The nation was shattered and quailed before him. But Fichte never lost heart. He proposed to serve with the army to encourage the soldiers, and when his offer was declined, he appealed eloquently to the people, and especially to his own students, to withhold no sacrifice to resist the ruthless invader. Courage awoke and success followed, but the hospitals of Berlin were crowded with sick and wounded men from the battlefields hard by. Fichte's wife was tireless as a nurse until she was struck down by fever. Her husband, lecturing in the evening, but at her bedside throughout the day, caught the disease from her and died, while she survived.

Belgium and France to-day are resisting the oppressor in the spirit of Fichte.

THE PLUCKIEST OF THE LOT.

THE Ward Sister stood by the bedside of an English soldier who had been wounded in action in Belgium. He was telling her something of what he had been through. What was the bravest deed he had witnessed, she asked? "I will tell you," he replied. "In the engagement in which I was wounded we had a young officer in our company who had not been under fire before. We were lying down with little cover, and the firing was pretty hot. I happened to look round and saw the lieutenant standing close behind me. His face was white and he was trembling. Just then another officer came along. 'Hullo, old man!' he said, smiling, 'do you feel afraid?' 'Yes, I do,' replied our man, 'and if you had felt half as terrified as I am you would have run away from the field long ago.' When a man can't help feeling like that, and yet sticks at his post and does his duty, I think he's a trump; he's the pluckiest of the lot, Sister."

COUNCIL FOR THE STUDY OF INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS.

THE following letter has been sent to us for publication:—

1, Central Buildings, Westminster, S.W.
February, 1915.

SIR,—Just before the outbreak of the War, Viscount Bryce expressed the view that the provision of a wider and deeper education in international relationship had become an immediate and clamant necessity. An educational movement to meet this end is still more imperatively required to-day, when the great issues raised by the War need an educated democracy for their right solution. Accordingly, with Lord Bryce's cordial approval and sympathy, a Council has been formed for this special purpose. Peculiar obligation rests on all men and women of broad educational outlook to guide and inspire such an effort. Happily men and women everywhere are now showing a keen and widespread desire to study and understand the vitally important questions with which they are faced. The opportunity thus presented is a great one, for the final sovereign power rests in the hands of the people, and to aid them rightly to use that power is true national service. That which gives most impetus to educational work is the sense that it supplies the inspiration and guidance for effective citizenship, and we therefore make a strong appeal for help in an educational campaign.

The immediate aim should be to assist people to understand something of the issues raised by the War, the master ideas which lie at the foundations of our national life, the history of Europe, the philosophies behind policies, and the economic and ethical problems which the War will bequeath to the world. Beyond this is the larger task of education in true feeling and insight, and the reconstruction, not merely of the material fabric of civilisation, but also of its moral and spiritual basis. Every church and religious institution, and every organisation for the betterment of life and the propagation of ideals, as well as every man and woman of goodwill, may find scope for service in this great task. It cannot be done by any special group alone, but demands the combined wisdom and energy of all. Organisations such as the Workers' Educational Association, the National Home Reading Union, the National Adult School Union, and others, are already working along these lines. Whilst desiring to further the work of all such bodies, we seek to interest many beyond their borders in this movement. Obviously such a task can be approached in many ways, each valuable in its own place. Experience has shown that one of the most successful methods is that of Study and Discussion Groups. These are easy to form, suitable for persons of widely different capacity and attainments, and singularly effective as a means of carrying out Mazzini's great conception of "Education by Association." Are there not many prevented by circumstances from giving up their ordinary occupations for service abroad, who will feel it a duty to make leisure for doing work of this profoundly important kind?

Readers of this letter are cordially invited to help in one or more of the following ways:—

(a) By offering to lead such a Study Group. (It would help if any special qualifications were mentioned in replying.)

(b) By offering to join and assist in forming a Study Group.

(c) By offering the hospitality of their houses for such groups.

(d) By sending donations to help with the provision of text-books and other expenses connected with the campaign.

The Council has accepted hospitality in the shape of temporary office accommodation from the National Adult School

Union, and has also been fortunate in securing the co-operation of the British Institute of Social Service for purposes of reference and research.

The following have consented to act as an Advisory Council:—

Prof. W. G. S. Adams, Mrs. S. A. Barnett, Rev. David S. Cairns, D.D., Rev. R. J. Campbell, Rev. Dr. Clifford, G. Lowes Dickinson, Very Rev. Wm. Moore Ede, Walter Hazell, J.P., Treasurer of British Institute of Social Service; Right Hon. Arthur Henderson, M.P., President of the Brotherhood Council; The Bishop of Hereford, Rev. Canon Scott Holland, Rev. J. Scott Lidgett, Sir Oliver Lodge, The Headmaster of Eton, The Headmaster of Mill Hill School, The Bishop of Oxford, The Headmaster of the Manchester Grammar School, Prof. A. S. Peake, The Principal of Mansfield College, Oxford, The Principal of Ruskin College, Oxford, A. L. Smith, M.A., Mrs. Philip Snowden, Sir Richard Stapley, Rev. T. Tinsington Tatlow, Secretary of the Student Christian Movement; Rev. W. Temple, President of the Workers' Educational Association.

We cordially invite those who are interested in this subject to communicate with the undersigned. A pamphlet containing full particulars with regard to the formation of Study Groups will be forwarded on application.

Yours truly,

PERCY ALDEN,

GEORGE PEVERETT,

Hon. Secretaries (pro tem).

MINISTERS' PENSION AND INSURANCE FUND.

THE Triennial General Meeting of the Fund was held at Essex Hall, London, on Wednesday last, the Rev. Dr. J. Estlin Carpenter, Chairman of the Board of Managers, presiding. The reports for 1912-14 were submitted by the Secretary, the Rev. C. J. Street, and the accounts for the same period by the Treasurer, Mr. H. Chatfield Clarke, and were approved. Since the Fund began its operations eleven beneficiaries have died. Three of these were insured for pension only, and nothing was payable in return for the premiums. The representatives of the other eight received £2,144 7s. 3d. There are now 119 beneficiaries on the books, viz., 111 under the ordinary tables (10 of whom are in receipt of pension), 6 assisted toward special insurance, and 2 aged ministers in receipt of special annuity.

Mr. Bryan Johnson, Dr. W. Blake Odgers, the Revs. C. J. Street and W. G. Tarrant were re-elected on the Board of Management, and Dr. C. Herbert Smith and Mr. Sydney Martineau as auditors.

The following resolution was moved by the Chairman, seconded by Mr. Harold Wade, and adopted:—

"That this meeting commemorates with reverent regard three good friends of the Fund who have passed away since the last Triennial Meeting.

"Mr. John Harrison took an active part in the establishment of the Fund, and was a member of its Board of Managers from the beginning, bringing to its administration a warm interest in the welfare of our ministers and great business aptitude. The collection of an Auxiliary Fund for ministers in London and the South Eastern Counties was due to his generous energy, and this Fund has been a most valuable adjunct to the main organisation.

"Mr. Philip Holt as an original donor expressed his confidence in the management some years later by placing in their hands the sum of £2,000, 'to be applied, at the discretion of the Managers, as an addition to the capital of the Fund, or in aid of ministers in active service, or both'; and this munificent gift has enabled the Managers to aid cases of other ministers who did not come within the ordinary rules.

"Mr. William Long was also a generous contributor at the outset, and for many years a Manager of the Fund. With a large knowledge of our ministry and its needs, he joined to his business experience a most kindly sympathy, and his genial presence was always welcome at the meetings of the Board.

"To such tried friends of the Liberal faith the supporters and beneficiaries of the Fund owe a deep debt of gratitude, and they record with affectionate remembrance their high appreciation of their counsel and help."

At the Half-Yearly Meeting of the Board of Management, held earlier in the day, Mr. F. W. Monks was elected a member of the Board in place of Mr. P. J. Winsor, who retires through continued ill-health. It was reported that an elderly minister to whom the first payment of a special annuity had been made had since died. A legacy of £100 from Miss Gaskell and a reversionary legacy of £1,000 from Mrs. Alfred W. Worthington were reported. Two new applications for insurance were approved. A vote of thanks to the auditors was passed.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Birmingham.—The 805th and Annual Meeting of the Monthly Meeting of Protestant Dissenting Ministers of Warwickshire and Neighbouring Counties was held on March 2 at the Old Meeting Church, Birmingham, the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas being in the chair. The Secretary (the Rev. I. Wrigley) read the Annual Report and Balance Sheet. Seven meetings had been held during the year. One death had taken place, that of their friend Mr. Austin, and three new members had been admitted. The roll of members now contained twenty names. The Rev. Isaac Wrigley was re-elected Secretary and Treasurer, and the Rev. T. Graham was appointed auditor. The members unanimously passed a resolution reaffirming their desire for the holding of the National Conference this year; and since the Conference cannot now be held at the usual time, they strongly urge that, if at all possible, it be called together in the autumn of this present year. Archdeacon Gardner, of Aston, gave an address on 'St. Paul as a Mystic.' The address was followed by discussion, after which the ministers adjourned for tea, kindly provided by the friends of the Old Meeting Church.

Bridgwater.—We regret to announce the death at Bridgwater of Miss Kate Spiller, who was well known in the town, and deeply respected for the public services she had rendered to it throughout a long and strenuous life. As a member of the late School Board, of which she was for a time chairman, and also as a member of the local Education Committee, she had done valuable work, giving unstinted time and devotion to the objects she had at heart; and the congregation of Christ Church, with which she was prominently associated, shares in the general feeling of sorrow which her death has caused. The funeral service was held at Christ Church, conducted by the Rev. C. E. Pike. The interment took place at Wembdon Road Cemetery, where there was a large and representative gathering.

Leeds.—The Rev. H. D. Roberts, of Liverpool, preached at Mill Hill Chapel on Sunday, February 28, his subject in the morning being 'Courage, National and Individual.' In the course of his remarks he referred to the regrettable criticisms of Lord Haldane, which had resulted from a report in the press of a conversation with Prof. Eucken at Mrs. Humphry Ward's house prior to the war, in which he said that Germany was his spiritual home. The demand made by a number of irresponsible people that Lord Haldane should retire from the Government as a result of this remark was preposterous. The war had not cancelled the debt we owed to Germany in literature, music, philosophy, and science, and it was a matter for congratulation that this foolish outcry had been resisted.

Liverpool Postal Mission.—On Saturday afternoon, Feb. 27, the Annual Meeting of the Postal Mission was held in Ullet Road Church Hall, under the Presidency of the Rev. J. Collins Odgers. The audience included Mrs. Holt, Miss Melby, Miss Meade-King, and most of the ministers of the district. Mrs. J. C. Odgers, Miss E. G. Holt, and Miss Meade-King entertained the guests to tea at the close of the meeting. The Secretary (Miss Alison Hall) submitted an interesting report of the year's work. The outbreak of war caused a sudden cessation in the work and in interest in its objects; the Society ceased advertising literature, and met fortnightly instead of weekly to deal with old correspondents. A significant fact, however, was the large increase of applications received during the first half of the year, when the activity of the Society had been greater than ever before. This was so marked that, notwithstanding the sudden and serious interruption caused by the war, the total figures in every department were unprecedentedly large. During the six months of the war period a fair demand from old correspondents for literature continued. Several of these had joined the forces. The financial statement presented by the Treasurer (Miss E. G. Holt) showed that the deficit had been slightly decreased. The Rev. W. Jellie in moving the adoption of the report and accounts gave an address on the utility of the Postal Mission, with special reference to Colonial conditions. The motion was seconded by Miss E. K. McConnell. The President of the Society (Mrs. H. D. Roberts) in proposing a vote of thanks to the hostesses for their kind hospitality said she was sure that the Society was not only maintaining its usefulness, but increasing it. She had read through a large amount of correspondence in preparation for that meeting, and was more impressed than ever by its intelligence and spiritual sincerity. The alteration of mental attitude by the war had made their Committee feel a certain want of tracts or leaflets bearing directly on the present situation: leaflets strictly religious in tone, not theologically controversial; and they knew they had among them men of the spiritual insight to give them exactly what they needed. The matter was under consideration by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. She mentioned certain literature which had been in great demand by correspondents; notably work by Drummond, Carpenter, Armstrong, Savage, Sutherland, Crothers, and Mellone. It was interesting to know that Mr. Armstrong's 'God and the Soul' was as much appreciated as ever; and she read certain extracts from correspondence emphasising extreme spiritual indebtedness to that work. Dr. Drummond's 'Studies in Christian Doctrine' had also been of inestimable benefit to many. Miss E. C. Abraham seconded the motion. An exceptional and most interesting feature of the meeting on the completion of its ostensible business was the account, given in detail by the Rev. W. H. Drummond, of 'The Inquirer' Belgian Hospital Fund and its working under the superintendence of Mrs. Bernard Allen. Mr. Drummond showed how promptly and methodically, without the slightest waste or delay, or any expense except that involved by transport, everything contributed to this most appealing object, whether in money or kind, found its way directly to the places and persons in dire need of it. He described the systematic working of all the parts of the scheme and the untiring zeal of all those concerned in it. Mr. Drummond's sympathetic and vivid account could hardly fail to go home to the imagination of his hearers; and it is hoped that this fine piece of work, which is, in fact, a sacred duty towards those who have fallen under our burdens, may profit considerably by his visit to Liverpool.

London: Brixton.—In January No. 3 Company of the Girls' Own Brigade was formed. It has now 24 recruits, who are taught drill, singing, first aid, and country dances. On February 23 the girls invited the members of the Senior Boys' Club to a Social Evening. It was the first occasion on which the girls wore the dark blue uniforms which the Church members have kindly given them. After games and refreshments the girls entertained the boys with songs and recitations, and during the evening the Captain (Mrs. G. M. Elliott) was presented with some lovely flowers.

London: Islington.—It is with regret we announce the death of Ronald William Wilson, the eldest son of Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Wilson, of Beechwood, Fortis Green, N., at the age of 19 years. He returned home on Sunday, February 21, feeling unwell, and two days afterwards it was discovered that he was suffering from cerebro-meningitis, which he had caught whilst camping with the Royal Army Medical Corps (Territorials). He passed away on Sunday, February 28, the day before his 19th birthday. He was a young man of deep religious convictions, and greatly interested in the services of his Church. The funeral took place on Thursday at Golder's Green Crematorium, the officiating ministers being the Revs. J. J. Marten, of Horsham, and Dr. Tudor Jones.

London: Wandsworth.—On Thursday, February 25, an "Eisteddfod" was held, organized by the Young People's Total Abstinence Society. Competitions took place in various arts, and resulted in a very successful evening. There were over a hundred entries, including a considerable number from neighbouring Unitarian Churches. The judges were: Instrumental Music, Mr. A. W. Pearce; Vocal, Mr. Maskell-Hardy; Literature, the Rev. W. G. Tarrant; Elocution, Miss B. Bideleux; Impromptu Speaking, &c., Mr. G. P. Blizard; Cookery, Mrs. Griffin; Needlework, Mrs. B. Lawford. There was a large attendance, and warm congratulations were given to Mr. Wilfred Jones, who conducted the general arrangements. A collection was taken for the Sunday School Association Motor Ambulance Fund.

Newark.—A series of Special Services will be held on the Sunday evenings of March and April at the Free Christian Church, conducted by ministers of the North Midland Presbyterian and Unitarian Association.

Newcastle.—On Monday evening, March 1, an interesting gathering took place in the schoolroom of the Church of the Divine Unity, Newcastle-on-Tyne, when an address was presented to Alderman Sir Joseph Baxter Ellis, J.P., congratulating him upon completing fifty years' connection with the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association and with the firm of Messrs. J. Hindhaugh & Co., of which he is now the principal. Mr. Charles Carter, one of the oldest Unitarians in the district, made the presentation, and referred to the manner in which Sir Joseph Ellis had, during the whole of his career, devoted his energy to the uplifting of his fellow-man. He was first associated with the Church of the Divine Unity during the ministry of the Rev. James C. Street, and soon became one of the best-known exponents of Unitarianism in the North. Later on he took part in the municipal life of the city, and served in the capacity of Sheriff and Mayor, to which office he was again appointed as the first Lord Mayor, and was subsequently knighted. Sir Joseph Ellis expressed his great appreciation of the acknowledgment his services had received, and made a strong appeal to the young people to keep a straight course, and attach themselves to a Church of their own choice which would inspire and sustain them.

Southern Advisory Committee.—At a meeting of the Committee held on Monday last the following resolution was passed:—

"That the Rev. L. Jenkyn Jones, late minister at Woolwich, who desires to re-enter the ministry, has satisfied the Advisory Committee as to his personal character and general fitness for ministerial work."

Mr. Jones, on leaving Woolwich, where he was minister for several years, retired from the ministry in 1911, and now desires to take up ministerial work once again.

The Women's League.—The Women's League is not holding its usual London Winter Meeting, but members and friends are cordially invited instead to a Special Service for Women, to be conducted by the Rev. J. H. Weatherall, at Essex Church, Notting Hill, on Tuesday, March 16, at 5 o'clock.

York.—At the Annual Meeting of the Congregation of St. Saviourgate Chapel on February 28, presided over by Mr. Lewin, the Treasurer, Mr. Currie, said the financial report was the most satisfactory they had presented for the last eight years. The balance in hand was £22 as against £7 the previous year. Offertories had increased nearly 50 per cent, and an Organ Fund had also been started. The Secretary, Mr. Beal, read the Committee's Report, and referred to the gratifying increase of membership and Church attendance. Special mention was made of the Minister's Sunday morning class, the week-night Guild conducted by Mrs. Davis and her helpers, and of the interest evoked by the conferences held from time to time after the Sunday evening lectures, especially a series on 'Problems of the War.' Mr. Kempster presented the report of the Hymn Book Revision Committee, who have already issued the first part of a new supplement, and a discussion followed on methods of improving the musical part of the services.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

THE LAST LINK WITH THE BRONTËS.

The death is announced at Banagher, King's County, of Mrs. A. B. Nicholls, the second wife of the clergyman who married Charlotte Brontë. Mrs. Nicholls was as faithful as her husband to the traditions of the Brontë family, and was looking forward to the publication of a new edition of the poems of the three famous sisters under the editorship of Mr. Arthur Benson. She took a special interest in the portraits of Charlotte, Emily, and Anne, together, and of Emily alone, which Branwell Brontë painted, and was much gratified when they became the property of the nation and were hung in the National Portrait Gallery. The one is "a rough, common-looking oil painting," as Mrs. Gaskell put it; the other a real portrait of Emily, that "remnant of the Titans," showing far higher promise.

BAD SPENDING HABITS.

Prof. Urwick deals in a wise and practical manner with the urgent question of "spending in War-time" in one of the now familiar pamphlets published by the Oxford University Press. We are beginning to realise, he points out, that upon the thoughtful exercise of our spending power depends the realisation of the true social brotherhood which we all accept as the good end of our social actions, and the acute problems which have been raised lately by the unemployment of numbers of people whom the well-to-do have hitherto kept busy, has brought home to many the fact that their careless and extravagant habits in the past have prepared a great deal of suffering for a certain class of workers. Incidentally, Prof. Urwick discusses the fallacy of supposing that by the very act of spending money, irrespective of the things we spend it on, we are "benefiting trade" and "giving employment." "Workers and industry generally," he insists, "are supported in one way only—by the actual creation of real wealth for them to use and live upon." If we claim to support the people whose goods we buy the money we spend must have been earned by useful work which has really increased the resources of other workers.

A PRAYER FOR TRADERS AND CONSUMERS.

The following prayer has been written by Dr. Walter Rauschenbush for the Consumers' League of the United States, which desires that all food made and bought shall be produced under healthy conditions and at fair prices:—

O God, thou Father of us all, we praise thee that thou has bound humanity in a great unity of life so that each must lean on the strength of all, and depend for his comfort and safety on the help and labour of his brothers.

We invoke thy blessing on all the men and women who have toiled to build and warm our homes, to fashion our raiment, and to wrest from sea and land the food that nourisheth us and our children.

We pray that they may have health and joy, and hope and love, even as we desire for our own loved ones.

Grant us wisdom to deal justly and fraternally with every man and woman whom we face in the business of life.

May we not unknowingly inflict suffering through selfish indifference or the wilful ignorance of a callous heart.

Since the comforts of our life are brought to us from afar, and made by those whom we do not know nor see, grant us organised intelligence and power that we may send the command of our righteous will along the channels of trade and industry, and help to cleanse them of hardness and unfairness.

May the time come when we need wear and use nothing that is wet in thy sight with human tears, or cheapened by wearing down the lives of the weak.

Save us, we beseech thee, from unconscious guilt.

Speak thou to our souls, and bid us strive for the coming of thy kingdom of justice, when thy merciful and saving will shall be done on earth. Amen.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.

THERE is no need for us to say much here about our Belgian Hospital Fund this week, for an article by Mrs. Bernard Allen, setting forth exactly what has been done, appears on another page. It is a matter upon which we desire to take our readers and contributors completely into our confidence, for we know that the flow of money and gifts must depend upon the promptness with which the need is met and the feeling that sympathy is seasoned with common sense and business methods.

THERE are, however, one or two points that we should like to select for special emphasis this week. The money is not being hoarded in the bank, but is being used as fast as it comes in. All the necessary office expenses are provided gratuitously. There is no charge to the fund even for stationery or postage.

Everything is done as a labour of love. We have received this week our first donation of £100. It is a challenge to others to do the same, for it is clear that we shall need large gifts and many of them, if we are to cope adequately with our task. If some of our readers will canvass for us among their friends and neighbours we shall be grateful. None of the War Charities which are appealing for our help has revealed a more urgent need. Some of them are so bountifully supplied that they are able to afford the comfort of luxuries as well as what is barely necessary for health and the alleviation of pain. It is only for the latter that we ask, and it is not for ourselves but for the gallant soldiers of Belgium, who have deserved so well at our hands.

MRS. ALLEN makes it clear in her article how it has come to pass that this group of small hospitals is so inadequately supplied. They were improvised to meet an emergency and equipment was sadly lacking from the beginning. The material at the disposal of the Belgian Government is now greatly reduced, and it is only with generous help that they can be kept going at all. From inquiries made on the spot we are convinced that by far the best thing for us to do is to enable them to go on working on their own lines, under their own national flag. We must resist the desire either to control their management or to absorb them into any organisation of our own. But we can give them many of the things they need, without interference and without criticism, in the spirit of warm-hearted friendship.

* * *

THE dramatic event of this week has been the further progress of the Allied fleets in their attack on the Dardanelles. The fall of Constantinople has entered into the domain of probabilities, and already political speculation is busy about the future. Russia will naturally demand that she shall be protected against any closing of the Black Sea, and there are also sentimental reasons, unconnected with the control of the straits, why she should wish to possess Constantinople and renew some of the splendour of the former seat of Christian sovereignty. It is not, however, certain that she would be wise to do so. Apart from the jealousies to which it would expose her, it is doubtful whether it would be a wise step from the strictly military point of view. It is even open to argument that its possession would make her more vulnerable than she is at present.

* * *

IF, however, Russia at the end of the war desires to retain Constantinople there seems to be no adequate reason why we should regard it as a menace to ourselves. This possibility has been a bugbear to English statesmen for more than a century, and is responsible for many political mistakes in the past. In an important article on the Future of Constantinople in The Nineteenth Century and After for March Mr. J. Ellis Barker traces this dread to the dominating influence of Napoleon.

Since the time of Napoleon [he says] the question of Constantinople has loomed particularly large, and probably unduly large, on the political horizon. Apparently, the strategical importance of Constantinople is at present generally over-estimated, because the last few generations, instead of studying critically and without prejudice the real importance of that city, have been mesmerised by the pronouncements of the great Corsican warrior, and have repeated his celebrated saying that Constantinople is "the key of the world," although it is nothing of the kind.... History, as Napoleon has told us is a fabule convenue. Napoleon himself has skilfully created a fabule convenue around the city of Constantinople, and most of the mistaken views as to Russia's world-conquering aims were engendered by that great genius who has mystified England during a whole century, and has been responsible for a century of misunderstandings between this country and Russia.

THE Labour troubles of last week seem to have simmered down into quietness without any settlement which gives security for the future. There is much to be said for a policy of a full and frank disclosure of profits during the continuance of the war in all firms which receive Government orders. It would have a wholesome effect in checking private appetite at a time when all our thought ought to be of the public good. It would also enable us to test by reliable information the rumours of large fortunes being made at the expense of the workers. On the other hand, we think that it is worse than foolish to treat the whole question as one of a legitimate demand for more pay because labour has become so indispensable that it can make its own terms.

"THE average workman," says The Manchester Guardian, "is much like other people. When people want his work very badly he expects to be pretty well paid for it, but once satisfied that he is fairly paid he is ready enough to put his shoulder to the wheel." This sentence, as a comment upon the present situation, seems to us false in moral perspective. It is not a case of other people wanting his work. He is working for his country, for his own highest interests, for the saving of his own liberties and the defence of his own home. Let all legitimate grievances have proper attention. But it is this other point of view which must be emphasised. Men do not bargain about the terms upon which they will work when the ship is driving before the hurricane and their lives are in jeopardy, and they must not do it now, when every man with an ounce of imagination knows that we must school ourselves to endure hardness without grumbling, and set our faces like flint to see this thing through. All selfishness or hard bargaining in master or in man is treason to the State.

* * *

ON Tuesday Mr. Lloyd George announced the intention of the Government to ask for far-reaching powers in the control of armament works, and of all works in the country capable of being used for the manufacture of the munitions of war. In ordinary times any suggestion of this kind would have been hotly contested as disastrous to industrial enterprise and efficiency; but it has been accepted almost without comment as a matter of emergency, and for the moment it is better not to ask for explanations. Incidentally it may be remarked that the Labour members see in it a welcome experiment in collective ownership, while others will hail it as an endorsement of the principle that the manufacture of munitions of war ought to be entirely removed from the control of private interest.

* * *

THE National Council of Evangelical Free Churches has been in session in Manchester during this week. The meetings have secured a large amount of publicity in the local press, and have had this significant feature that they are the first corporate expression of the Christian faith and conscience of the nation since the outbreak of the war. A good deal of the speaking was eloquent, but a little inconclusive, and leaves the impression of a mood described by the Rev. Thomas Phillips in the phrase "a schism in the Christian soul." On the whole, it must be confessed that an unceasing flood of sermons and pamphlets has left us all just a little sated and weary. Even the Church cannot live on balanced judgments and fine sentiments. It asks for a policy of action and the prophetic voice that can nerve men for endeavour. The proceedings came closer to practical realities in the discussion of temperance and in the urgent plea of Mrs. George Morgan that the churches should deal pitifully and with wise judgment with the grave social problem of illegitimacy with which the country is confronted.

ON Wednesday the members of the Free Church Council assembled for worship in the Cathedral at the invitation of the Dean and Chapter. Once again there was the self-conscious apology—which we have heard so often—for the assembling of fellow Christians in a common House of Prayer. "It does not imply," the Dean was at some pains to point out, "that we aim at denying or concealing the differences, whether ecclesiastical or political, which have, unhappily, long severed, and still sever us." But he passed on quickly to deeper things, and in the following passage of his address he appealed without reserve to the ultimate source of Christian unity amid our changing forms:—

Christianity [he said] is to-day charged with failure, not unreasonably, when so many Christian nations are arrayed against each other in the fiercest, the most sanguinary, and the most nearly universal of all wars. Brethren, if Christianity has failed, so has science, so has civilisation; and at least it cannot be alleged that Christianity has, like science, supplied the instruments of its own destruction, or, like civilisation, created a savagery worse than any barbarism which has preceded it, because it is civilised barbarism. When the war is over, amidst the wreckage and desolation which it has wrought, there will still remain inviolate and inviolable the figure of Him who is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever, who holds in His pierced hands the key of the mystery encompassing life and death; who alone has spoken upon earth in the accents of Heaven; who is the one immortal Saviour and Redeemer of the world. He shall some day unite the Christians not only of England, but of England and Germany too, in the sacred fellowship of His love.

THE compromise which has been arrived at in the House of Lords on the Welsh Church Bill is moderate and wise. As supporters of the policy of Welsh Disestablishment we are sorry that the question has been raised at all. But if there is a real sense of grievance, not with the measure which has received the approval of Parliament, but with its enforcement at a particular moment, on the ground that it would involve difficulty and financial hardship owing to the special circumstances created by the war, there is certainly a good case for kindly consideration. The Government was, of course, bound to guard itself against the possibility that postponement might be turned to political profit. But in view of the undertaking of the Opposition that they will do nothing in Parliament to prevent the Bill being put into operation, the proposal to give six months grace from the close of the war will meet with widespread approval. No doubt there will be a good deal of legitimate disappointment in some quarters, but against this must be placed the assuagement of wounded and angry feeling, and the brighter outlook for religious sympathy in the future.

THE YOUNG MEN.

THEY are everywhere, the young men. The whole country resounds with the martial music of their feet. They crowd the trains. They come swinging down the street, whistling as they go, disciplined soldiers, often led by young officers who are little more than boys. They are on their way to the coast, and there—for us who wait and watch at home—the curtain falls. It is wonderful this march of the young men, because their country calls. It has in it the daring of a great adventure and the spiritual splendour of sacrifice. But they do not speak of it in these high terms. For them it is all in the day's work. They do not want either our admiration or our pity. We feel that they are noble just because in the acceptance of their duty they have lost all thought of themselves. We know that it is a grim business this waging of war to which they go; there is no need for any one to recount to us its miseries. And yet we have never seen the clean, upright soul of the people so clearly as in the bright faces of these young soldiers.

If you watch the family groups at a hundred railway stations on Sunday evening, when the short leave is over, you will feel the pathos and glory of it all. Here the girl chats with her lover and conceals the aching of her heart with light tripping words, because there must be no sadness of farewell. Here a big soldier spends the last moments saying "Don't cry, mother," not caring who hears him, and then as the train moves away he exclaims: "It's the hardest thing of all, leaving one's mother," and suddenly for a few moments the whole carriage is solemn and still.

We who stay at home also have our part to play in the struggle. We can keep the wheels of industry running smoothly. We can guard our own hearts and the soul of the nation from the base passions which enervate and enslave. We can still use the pen in the battle for freedom and righteousness when we are too old to wield the sword. Above all, we can be prodigal in our healing charities as our young men are in the gift of their lives. But in the midst of all our activity let us never bemuse ourselves with the thought that at the moment our part is as important or as creditable as theirs. We cannot be generous on their scale, unless we go and do likewise. No sacrifice or service that we render has the same ultimate value as this complete surrender of themselves. If our homes are preserved in safety and our liberties vindicated before the world, if stricken Belgium is delivered and its bitter wrongs avenged, it is the young men who are going forth to do it. Many of them will return no more. They will suffer cruel torment. They will sleep in unknown graves. But their blood will be the price of deliverance from the rod of the oppressor. Even now, as they rise up before us, from every town and village of the land, an exceeding great army, they are beginning to write a new chapter in the history of their country, and it will be as kindling in its courage and self-devotion and its high example of chivalry and endurance as any that the past has known.

A debt like this can never be repaid. It is fraught with too deep a significance for the common words of praise. But at this fateful moment when they are actually going forth to face death for our sake, let us at least show our gratitude by our behaviour. There are people who have not yet lost all the petty habits of the critical mind. They still cavil about minor points, and indulge in the "speculative desponding considerations" which roused the robust anger of Dr. Johnson because they discourage men from diligence and exertion. Most of us are in no mood for such trivialities. The time for debate has passed, and the time for resolute action has come. Our young men are going forth to fight and die. They have had a plain duty set before them, and they have accepted it. Where is the critic or the sophist who will try to obscure it or throw doubt upon their clean integrity of soul? Let them go surrounded with encouragements, feeling in the very air they breathe the gratitude we cannot speak.

It is a time, also, when the sentimentalist should hold his peace. He may spare us his florid descriptions of mangled limbs and blood-stained fields. We know it all. The iron has entered into our soul. Our young men are not daunted by the prospect of suffering. We are not going to allow our homage to their fortitude to be weakened by pity or fruitless tears. Why should we insult those who are paying the price of valour and spiritual victory by sorrow for their lot? They will forgive us, the young men as they march away, if there is dimness in our eyes; for are they not bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh? But there is exultation in our hearts as we think of them and follow them with our affection where they go. May they be worthy to serve, and if need be to die. Who will dare to grieve for the young, who in a few years accomplish great things and win the unfading crown of sacrifice.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

THE MEANING OF PRAYER.

Every creature hath some kind of sense of its state: it feelth its weakness, its wants, its misery. It hath some sense of that Power from which it came, who provideth for it, who is leading it some whither: and it cannot but cry and complain to this Power, according to what it feels and desires. The young Ravens cry to it for food; the whole creation groaneth and panteth to it, to be delivered from its bondage. Man, as he hath a clearer light than these, so he hath more clear addresses to it.... By Prayer, I do not mean any bodily exercise of the outward man; but the going forth of the Spirit of Life towards the Fountain of Life, for fulness and satisfaction; the natural tendency of the poor, rent, derived spirit, towards the Fountain of spirits.

ISAAC PENINGTON.

I have no answer for myself or thee, Save that I learned beside my mother's knee;

"All is of God that is, and is to be;

And God is good." Let this suffice us
still,

Resting in childlike trust upon His will Who moves to His great ends unthwarted by the ill. WHITTIER.

O GOD, the Father of all mankind, whose Name is great, and Thy goodness inexhaustible; Thou Master of all things, who art blessed for ever; before whom stand thousands of thousands, angels and spirits and souls made perfect: sanctify, O Lord, our souls and bodies and spirits, and touch our hearts, and search out our consciences, and cast out of us every evil thought and base desire, all envy and pride, hypocrisy and falsehood, all deceit and worldly anxiety, all covetousness and vainglory, all malice and wrath, and all remembrance of injuries, and every movement of thought contrary to Thy holy will. And grant us, O Lord, the Lover of men, with freedom of a pure heart and a contrite soul, without confusion of face, and without condemnation, boldly to call upon Thee, our holy God and Father who art in heaven. Amen.

THE WORK OF OUR BELGIAN HOSPITAL FUND.

THE consignment of goods sent to the Belgian hospitals last week had quite an adventurous journey. For three days our packing cases were waiting to start, but delayed by possibilities of German submarines in the Channel. Then at last at dawn one morning they crossed, and within forty-eight hours were all delivered at their destinations, in fourteen different hospitals, some of them nearly forty miles distant from our hospital dépôt. I think contributors to the Fund will like to know a little about some of the hospitals. There was a time, not many months ago, when a great stream of wounded descended on the town with which we are most concerned. Wounded men on stretchers were carried along the streets, and even private householders were implored to take them in. The result was that schoolrooms, chapels, empty factories, places of amusement were thrown open, and the patients admitted. The organisers gradually acquired beds, some blankets, and a certain amount of material. The Belgian Army Medical Service allows them a certain sum for maintenance, but there has never been enough money to equip these places fully as regular hospitals. Many of the beds have no linen on them, and there is shortage of hospital necessities of all sorts.

Let me give a few typical cases. Here is one, managed by a community of the Little Sisters of the Poor. The patients have beds, it is true; but how has that been contrived? Quite simply—by all the sisters giving up their own, and sleeping on the floor themselves. They are hard at work nursing and cooking and carrying on their ordinary charitable work all day, and as one of them said: "We sleep quite well, we young ones; but Sœur T——, she is 75 years old, and the floor is rather hard at her age." Readers of THE INQUIRER will remember a letter of thanks from the Sister Superior a fortnight ago—full of gratitude for our help, not one word about their own self-sacrifice.

Now another hospital: this time in the charge of English girls—plucky and skilled in their work—under the direction of a Belgian doctor. They go in their motor ambulance every night up to the trenches and bring back wounded to be nursed back to health. Their resources are not great, and there are many things they need badly. They literally fell upon a case of bandages, dressings, &c., sent by the Lady Mayoress of Leeds to our Fund, thankfully carrying off all that could be spared for them.

Here is a third: organised by a French Abbé, who in happier times has for his chief hobby a trade school for boys. This is now cut down in numbers to a mere handful, and most of the buildings are turned into wards, making airy, spacious rooms, very bare, with just beds in two long rows. Here he receives 150 Belgian soldiers, supervises the arrangements, and does everything he can for them as far as his limited resources permit, happy to be able to realise in practice his religious ideals.

Here is a fourth: a hospital ship, full of convalescents, moored in the harbour. The men who are up have nothing to do—no games, books, nothing to amuse them; they are not suitably clad; they lack all the comforts that would help them to recover a healthy outlook on life; they are sad and depressed. It is a difficult task for doctors and nurses to carry them across the line which divides sickness from health. Beside the clothing which we have already sent we are sending a few games of cards, and we should like to send more. Now that we know of these—and many other—cases, the responsibility rests with us, who have our home and lives scarcely touched by the war, to come to the succour of those who have lost homes, families, country, and health in helping to preserve our security.

Mention was made a few weeks ago of the need for more nurses, and we hoped that we might have found it possible to send some over. We have made careful inquiries about the needs, and consulted several nursing authorities, but so far no scheme has seemed practicable. I fear it must wait a little longer, until the way opens.

But the way is open to make these hospitals more comfortable and efficient, and here is a very rough account of the way the money sent to our Fund for this purpose has been expended:—

Household linen	about £70
Blankets	35
Underclothing	120
Boots	100
Overcoats and trousers for Convalescents	80
Drugs and hospital equipment ..	260
Kitchen utensils and cleaning materials	35

(The only clothing bought consists of articles which cannot be made by working parties.) The consignment to go this week will cost about £350 in medicines, instruments, and utensils, as their full needs were not known to us then; the sheets, pillow cases, and towels, and some underclothes about £150. This means we shall have spent about £1,200 so far. In addition to this, we have had anaesthetics and a very great number of bandages and dressings given us, and clothes to a most generous extent. The total number of hospitals which have applied to us for help is 29, with a total of over 2,000 beds.

In addition to this, I have this week received a letter from a stretcher bearer and dresser at the front, in which he says: "I am in constant contact with our dear soldiers, and it would be easy for me to attend to many little ills from which they habitually suffer, but the means are lacking here. May I beg you to send me a satchel containing the things mentioned below, and encouraged and upheld by our dear friends across the Channel, we shall carry on the struggle with renewed ardour?" He asks for a few simple dressings and drugs, which we are sending this week.

It will be seen that the money already subscribed to this Fund has been nearly all expended. Fresh supplies are needed week by week, and the need can only be met by increased liberality. The more closely we come into contact with these hospitals and their needs the greater is our admiration of the heroism of those who are carrying them on. In the spirit of the sincerest friendship we simply want to help them to help themselves.

FORCE IS NO REMEDY.

SIR,—The attitude of the Rev. Basil Martin appears to depend for its support upon large assumptions for which there is little or no warrant in the existing facts or the experiences of life hitherto. If we proceed by a process of elimination the whole structure of his argument seems to fall to the ground. In the first place it is not a fact that the opposition of Belgium was unexpected by Germany (the effectiveness of the opposition was, probably, quite unexpected); therefore the assumption that the German barbarities in Belgium were brought about by the fierce anger arising from unexpected opposition cannot be maintained. Even assuming that Germany really did believe that Belgium would offer no resistance, we know that it was her avowed intention of violating the neutrality of Belgium for the purpose of more easily "hacking her way through" to Paris, and that she had provided herself with all the necessary instruments of ruthless destruction for this purpose. There is, therefore, no ground for the general assumption that Germany would not invade an unarmed and non-resisting nation. The facts of Germany's methods of administration, whether in Europe or in her Colonies, entirely belie the assumption that the routine of life in Belgium under German dominion would be little changed. Has Mr. Martin forgotten the Zabern incident? It cannot be denied that the Government of Germany is subservient to the Prussian militarist ideal. We must assume, therefore, according to Mr. Martin's argument, that the character of the population of Germany is grounded on militarism. What foundation, therefore, is there for the assumption that if our free democratic institutions were peaceably exchanged for a military despotism—whose seat of government is far distant from our shores—the exchange would give full scope for social reform? In other words: is it a reasonable assumption that if freedom surrenders itself incontinently to military despotism the cause of social reform will be advanced?

Mr. Martin assumes that all war, and this war in particular, can only be, and is being conducted by us by a large amount of deceit and by the employment of persons "moved by that lust of bloodshed which is sometimes felt even by those who win a Victoria Cross." If his words are to be taken at their face value they imply that the whole civil and military administration of this country is tainted with deceit and bloodthirstiness. We are surely entitled to some evidence beyond mere assertion for so sweeping an assumption.

It has generally been thought that it was a noble thing for a nation or for an individual to fight for freedom; and that through freedom alone could an individual or a nation hope to attain a true ideal. We are now asked by Mr. Martin to assume that the sacrifice of independence by a great nation might likely lead to the salvation of the world. It seems a paradox, but is there any underlying truth? Is it ever true that the dignity and glory of a great nation consist in offering up its priceless treasures of civil and religious liberty at the bidding of an arrogant and unscrupulous tyrant, and in meekly standing by while he despoils the weak? I would rather assume that in this imperfect world Providence has implanted in mankind a spirit of resentment against oppression in any form, and that we are led by that spirit to use force to protect the weak against the encroachments of the strong. Force is no remedy when it is wielded by an arrogant nation setting out to subdue the world to its own particular ideals; but in the hands of an enlightened nation, bent on rescuing the fallen and oppressed from the clutches of ruthless barbarism, it is a remedy for which we may be devoutly thankful. AFTER THE WAR.

SIR,—The reading of the Rev. J. C. Ballantyne's article in your last issue, with the above heading, recalls to me that fine couplet of Alfred de Musset:—

L'homme n'écrit rien sur le sable
A l'heure où passe l'aquilon.

The hour for social reconstruction has not struck, and any attempt at it now would prove no more than writing on the sand in a hurricane—all traces of our efforts would be swiftly swept away. But the hour has struck "to speak of this thing, to work for it, to pray for it." What we shall write in enduring letters after the war, not on the sand, but on the very granite-beds of our civilisation—that is now the question. It is the time for the most resolute thinking, for grappling with the problems that will confront us, and for planning out the main lines of future advance. The war has not solved the menacing social problems that assailed us on the eve of its outbreak. The strike on the Clyde supplies us here with a stern reminder. Anarchy, with a general disrespect and disregard for the laws, will speedily raise its head again. Social iniquities will clamour for a hearing. Our political, religious, and social unities, which only national emergency could have effected, will be cloven again. And the soldier, returning from the wars, in his hundred thousands—"me that 'ave seen what I've seen!"—will add to the abounding discontents. There will be more heart-hungers and soul-hungers than ever to satisfy.

The only time in our history that seems to me to be at all comparable with that upon which we are entering is the Commonwealth period which succeeded the Civil War. The times will demand a Milton and a Cromwell, and the faith that was at the back of them. And the task will be, as Cromwell stated it, "the introducing of the Christian religion into real practice in the social affairs of this nation"—and the world.

1. The first and greatest need of all will be of religion. And, in this matter, we shall have to learn to think again not in nations only, but in continents. We have got, in short, to discover and proclaim world standards of universal validity and authority. Nothing short of this can save us, and, without this, all the rest is the veriest tinkering. 2. Following out of this, and only out of this, will issue the only possible solution of the education difficulty in this and every land. Only in a universal religion will education ever discover its unity and its very breath of life. Secular education, and secular everything, have got to have breathed into them a living soul. 3. And social reform, if ever it is to prove ultimately effective for the general welfare, will need to be no less vivified and grounded. Without this, Hague Tribunals and every other professed social panacea will be puffed over like a pack of cards at the first onset.

It was just such questions as these, and those arising out of them, which the National Conference Union for Social Service desired to have grappled with by our Churches on the basis of its published course of lessons on the war entitled 'European International Polity.' Some of our leading Churches, in Nottingham, Liverpool, Edinburgh, and elsewhere have already grappled with these questions, and a number of ministers have dealt with them from the pulpit. But the time has come for a far more general discussion of such questions. It will probably now be difficult to institute new courses before the autumn, but, in any case, preparation for such should begin at once. And there is a further incentive in this direction supplied by the fact that the Swanwick Summer School, under the auspices of the Interdenominational Conference of Social Service Unions, will hold its sessions from June 26 to July 5 next, when 'International Relationships in the Light of Christianity' will be the sole subject under discussion. With a further view to leading up to this, a course of twelve weekly notes of lessons by Miss Gittins, under the auspices of the National Conference Union for Social Service, will run through the April, May, and June numbers of The Sunday School Monthly, and will, it is hoped, be taken up widely by the elder scholars of our Sunday Schools. The course will be completed on the eve of the Swanwick Summer School. And if in the autumn it could be arranged that the Triennial National Conference of our Churches should still meet—as several bodies of ministers have unanimously demanded—and devote one or more days to the discussion of these great questions, a still further stimulus would then be given our Churches for grappling with these questions in the months that will intervene. I shall be glad to send copies of the "Course" referred to and information about our Union gratis to any one on receipt of a postcard.—Yours, &c., H. H. JOHNSON,

Secretary, National Conference Union for Social Service.

THE NATION AND LABOUR.

SIR,—Is there not a little too much lecturing on labour just now? That there should be "unrest," even cessation of work, here and there, is to be regretted, of course, but may not some provocation be pleaded in extenuation? Graft and exploitation have been notoriously rampant in certain quarters, and the criticism thereof has not been particularly severe. The workers of the country, who, after all, bear the largest share of the burden of the war, have a clear right to insist that the grafter and the exploiter shall not be allowed to make that burden heavier than it need be. Labour, as a whole, has shown a fine spirit in this national emergency. If certain big contractors, transport and colliery companies and others had behaved as well, we should have had no labour troubles.—Yours, &c., HAROLD RYLETT.

THE UNITARIAN HOME MISSIONARY COLLEGE.

The Unitarian Home Missionary College, 1854-1914: its Foundation and Development, with some Account of the Missionary Activities of some of its Members. By H. McLachlan, M.A., B.D. London: Sherratt & Hughes, 3s. 6d. net.

THE vigorous existence of the College at Manchester has now been prolonged to a number of years sufficient to warrant its having a history, and the writing of it has been accomplished in a most thoroughgoing and industrious fashion by the Warden of Summerville. It is a necessary book, and it will have a permanent place in the records of an age now passing away, for the College was a characteristic creation of certain social forces at work in the nineteenth century and certain currents of feeling and opinion in the Unitarian community. In every religious organisation there arises from time to time the demand for new methods of working and fresher initiative, and in this respect the history of the College exhibits a fine set of ardent and disinterested spirits whose bold courage would do honour to any cause. Besides this, there is the popular or democratic note implied in the word "missionary," and this is peculiarly in keeping with the temper of the time, which produced men like Dr. J. R. Beard, who saw before them a vision of almost immeasurable good to be wrought out for the poorer classes by the spread of popular education and enlightened ideas of life and religion. The writer of the book has seized upon this part of the matter, and made it the key-note of the whole history by devoting his first chapter to "1854 in Manchester." Then, also, there is the deep and never-yet-resolved disharmony in the Unitarian manner of thought, between the feeling for perfect openness and breadth on the one hand, and the feeling for definite teaching on the other. The founders of the College were decisively and strenuously on the side of definiteness. The College was to be Unitarian for Unitarians.

How far these various tendencies which have combined to fire the enthusiasm of some generations of students and supporters have actually kept to their original purpose is a matter that is not yet ripe for decision. Like the monastic orders which began in poverty, but gradually attained to wealth and power, this Institution tends inevitably, by virtue of the splendid zeal and ability with which it has been conducted, to supply ministers who will fill not only the pioneer stations, but also the most responsible posts the churches have to offer. The connection with the Manchester University, which, of course, forms a conspicuous part of the story, cannot but cause more and more stress to be laid upon scholarship, and in that case the "missionary" side of the matter can scarcely be so prominent. It is significant that while the writer says that "the Domestic Mission was restricted in its operation by lack of the type of minister already indicated," i.e.,

"men who were of the people," out of sixteen Domestic Missionaries of the present day only two were educated at the Home Missionary College. It is, by the way, this same connection with the Manchester University which has given the writer occasion to speak of the removal of Manchester New College to London in a way that may produce misapprehension, and has actually led The Manchester Guardian reviewer to say that the divinity teaching at Owens College "frightened Manchester New College away" to London in 1853. Mr. McLachlan even permits himself to speak of Manchester New College having made "the great refusal." The fact is, of course, that there had been for many years previous to this a movement in favour of the removal to London. Mr. J. J. Tayler had wished for it in 1840 when the College became affiliated to London University. In 1848 he wrote regretting that a legal decision had been given adverse to the removal, and this was some time before the famous Nonconformist deputation to the Owens Trustees. In those days the available energy and resources of Unitarians had been given to the support of the new enterprise at University Hall, London, which offered the greatest promise. On the other hand, Owens was then but an untried possibility, and it would have been most unwise to tie up the fortunes of Manchester New College to the chances of wreck, which, as all the Nonconformist bodies were agreed, seemed to threaten the divinity-teaching proposals. There was really no alternative, as the facts then stood, but to join hands with University Hall.

THE WORLD IN ALLIANCE: A PLAN FOR PREVENTING FUTURE WARS. By Frank Noel Keen, Barrister-at-Law. London: Walter Southwood & Co., Ltd. 1s. net.

THIS ably written book should help to bring "the parliament of man, the federation of the world" appreciably nearer realisation. Its appearance indicates that these things are no longer mere utopian dreams, but are fast coming within the range of practical politics; and the present world-crisis is giving a tremendous emphasis to every argument for their establishment. Mr. Keen's plan for preventing future wars includes as its three essentials an international council, an international code of law, and an international police; and in respect to each of them the scheme is briefly yet carefully worked out, and provides an admirable basis for further discussion. By apt analogies drawn from history and from the machinery of English Government Mr. Keen shows how the problems that would arise in connection with such international arrangements as he advocates have already to a large extent been solved in advance. Thus in regard to what is perhaps the greatest problem of all, he points out that the international parliament might effect the transference of territory from the rule of one State to that of another in the same way as the English Parliament transfers a district on the outskirts of a great town from the control of a rural authority to the control of the urban one—a proceeding which, as he says, "sometimes causes contention almost as strenuous and acrimonious as that which, between nations, is the precursor of war." We earnestly commend this exceedingly informing and suggestive volume to all who are seeking guidance along the lines which it indicates.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

THE RIVER GRETA IN MARCH.

It is 8.30 on a dull chill March morning. As we stand by the open window we hear no movement of the river just across the road. There has been no heavy rain for some days, so the brooks ("becks" we call them) have not brought much tribute to the Greta, and its waters run clear and without a rushing noise; yet it is not so low as to make a rippling sound among half-exposed pebbles, as it often does in summer. Suddenly the silence is broken by a clear, sweet warble, a continuous warble. On a partly covered boulder sits the musician. He is a dipper. He wears a dark brown coat, which in the absence of strong light looks black. His broad breast is of glossiest white. But for this breast and his stumpy uptilted tail you might think he was a small thrush. He trills away cheerily in spite of the chill mist. The song is perfect, for he is a long-mated bird, and the hen is seen five yards away. She is running about in a shallow, stooping every few seconds to snatch a grub or other water tit-bit from the river bed. When she sees something eatable in deeper water she plunges under and secures it. If it is a tiny snail in a shell she will fly with it to the nearest stone, and there bang and smash it, as the thrush does when it finds a garden snail and wishes to eat the soft contents of the shell.

Every day at this hour these two birds are to be seen at this spot; but you will look for them in vain at 8.45. They know the sound of children's feet on the road above them, and are aware, when they hear it, that a white-breasted dipper on a boulder is a tempting target to young folks who are on the way to school. The Keswick children of to-day may be too merciful to pelt dippers, but these birds are experienced, and evidently prefer to take no risks. They make for a more secluded place below the weir; but they do not leave their beat, and by about 10.30 will have fished their way down stream till they are once more at their pet feeding ground under these windows, where they will feel safe until the noontide rush out of school.

There is a brownish something stirring the faded storm-washed grasses that fringe the river bank opposite. Something is moving by the alder tree that droops over the stream. Is it a bird? No, it is too long for its low stature. If it would come from under the partial cover of the trailing grasses one could recognise it. It has reached those stones half-buried in the bank. It has gone!

Yet we did not see it pass on or go back. A brown terrier is trotting along the bank, nosing his way, as little dogs love to do. Something has excited him, he quickens his pace and sniffs harder. He has reached those stones, and now he is keenly interested. He works round the stones, peering and sniffing just as I remember seeing another dog peer and sniff at the same spot yesterday. The little mystery is cleared up. The brownish object must have been a water rat which has a run in that bank and has disappeared down a hole among those stones. Many a time we have seen water rats swim the river and land on the further bank. The common house rat is greyish brown, and has well marked ears; the water rat (or vole) has a ruddy brown back, and his small ears are almost hidden in soft fur. His tail is about half as long as that of the house rat. The latter needs a long flexible tail to balance himself with when he jumps in a fright off the pantry shelf, or down several cellar steps with a cat after him. The water rat needs a short thick tail to act as rudder when he swims. He is not easily seen when he crosses flowing water, for he disturbs the water very little and glides by under the very noses of unobservant people, the only parts of him above water being the head and upper back. Even his grey throat is under water.

Have you ever noticed that when one kind of beauty is lost in a landscape, another takes its place? Here is an instance. Until a few weeks ago the long grass on the river bank had not wholly lost the brilliant green of last summer. When this was finally taken from it by frost, wind, and flood we were given a new colour to enjoy. The hawthorns and birches scattered among the alders on the bank took on a soft pinkish purple, or purplish pink tint which is very lovely in sunshine. Wordsworth calls this colour puce. It is a good background for a bird or insect which has any bright colour. The yellows of a blue tit or a bunting are examples.

If you are in some district which is new to you and you wish to know where the streams run, look for the water-loving trees: the willow in flat places where the stream is sluggish, the alder in hilly places where the current is swifter. Much of the course of the Greta is marked by alders. Do you know these trees and their small rounded cones? Alder seeds are among the chief joys of the smaller seed-eating birds.

Provided they can get enough food I do not think our birds suffer from the cold of an ordinary winter. One very cold evening just before it grew dark I saw a blackbird take a bath in the Greta. Again and again he stooped and drenched himself with the icy water. Of course, most birds bathe through the winter, but they usually do it in the warmest hours of the sunniest days. We notice that they have two chosen bathing places on the south bank of the river, not far from our house, two tiny bays of shallow water with a rather sandy shore. In these the starlings and sparrows have regular bathing parties, but each kind of bird bathes separately. How the sparrows splash and chirp, and seem to be making fun, like so many happy children!

MEMORIAL NOTICES.

MISS MARY MARTINEAU.

THOSE who taught or who were taught at Portland Sunday School in the days of Miss Tyrrell and Mr. Wicksteed will remember Miss Mary Martineau, who has just passed away well stricken in years. She was born in January, 1829, at Tulse Hill, her father being Mr. George Martineau, who had a sugar refinery in Whitechapel, and her mother being one of the Greenhows of Newcastle. Her childhood was spent at Tulse Hill, and she and her sisters were sent to Miss Lewis's school at Putney. After her father's death in 1857, she, with her mother and her sister Fanny removed to Foxholes, Weybridge, which was their hospitable home for many years, till they removed to Thornton Road, Clapham Park. Even while living at Weybridge and later from Clapham Park they regularly attended Little Portland Street Chapel, during Dr. Martineau's ministry, and Mary always stayed on to teach in the afternoon Sunday School. She also played the harmonium, and occasionally conducted the children's service. Her activity was not confined to the Sunday teaching; for, notwithstanding the distance from her home, she became acquainted with the homes of the scholars; and this led her to provide rooms at Balham, where families could be received for a fortnight's country air. She arranged for a regular succession of families for six months of the year; and this involved no small expenditure of time and thought, and often a fatiguing trip up to town to avoid the rooms being left vacant, when a busy mother found she could not arrange to move her family on the day that had been fixed.

I have often thought that a Sunday school, if worked heartily and conscientiously, is quite as educative for the teachers as for the scholars; and I was particularly struck with this in Mary Martineau's case, for I never knew any one grow and broaden in views and sympathies, late in life, more than she did. I remember her saying to me: "One learns as one grows older to look at things from other people's point of view"—a matter in which we used in her younger days to think she was lacking, but she learnt it in her intercourse with the Sunday scholars and their parents, and it put heart into her arrangements for them at Balham. For many years she used to send the girls of the day school (or as many as could get leave from their parents) once a week to a public swimming bath; and I think she also provided them with bathing-dresses. Advancing years and growing infirmities at length obliged her to give up her Sunday school teaching and her rooms at Balham; and for several years she was very infirm, and her sight and hearing were gradually failing. But she retained her cheerfulness, and continued to take an interest in public affairs. On February 25 she had a stroke, from which she never rallied, and she passed away peacefully on the following day.

MR. T. P. WARREN.

WE regret to record the death of Mr. Thomas Pickard Warren, which took place on Wednesday, March 3, at Handcross Park, Sussex. He was the youngest of the five children of Thomas Pickard Warren of Highbury House, Highbury, and it was there that he was born on May 4, 1837. His elder sister was the wife of the late Mr. Frederick Nettlefold. Mr. Warren's father was a man of the highest principle, large-hearted, and generous, with deep religious feeling, a Unitarian of the older school. One of his ancestors was the Rev. Edward Pickard, for many years minister of Carter Lane Chapel, near St. Paul's, and founder (with others) of the Orphan Working School at Haverstock Hill. When Carter Lane Chapel was removed to Islington in 1862, and a new building erected there under the name of Unity Church, Mr. Warren, Sen., put up a stained glass window in memory of the Rev. Edward Pickard, the subject being 'Christ Blessing Little Children.' Mr. T. P. Warren was related on his mother's side to the Courtauld family, one of the many families who came over to England from France on the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes in 1685. As a boy, he went to the school carried on by the Rev. J. P. Malleson (a connection by marriage) at Hove House, Brighton. He matriculated at London University, and subsequently studied for a time at Guy's Hospital with the view of entering the medical profession. Ultimately he joined the firm of Samuel Courtauld & Co., in Aldermanbury, with which his eldest brother, Mr. John Warren, was already connected. When the company was reconstructed he became a director and eventually chairman. He retired from the firm in 1913.

Mr. Warren married Miss Bell, daughter of Mr. Bell of Lancaster Gate in 1886, and his only son, John Raymond Warren, is a member of the Inner Temple. He enjoyed reading books of science and philosophy, and had an excellent memory. In his younger days, after attending a debate in the House of Commons in the evening, he could repeat a great part of it the next morning, and the same after hearing a sermon which interested him. But he was most endeared to those who knew him best by his thoughtful and considerate unselfishness. He had, at the same time, much strength and decision of character, united to deep religious feeling. The funeral, which was largely attended by relatives and friends, took place on Saturday, March 6, at Slaugham Church. The Bishop of Chichester, for many years Vicar of Christ Church, Lancaster Gate, and an old friend, officiated.

MR. WILLIAM ARCHER is to preside at the Sixth Conway Memorial Lecture, which will be delivered by Prof. Gilbert Murray at South Place Chapel, Finsbury, on Tuesday evening, March 16, at 8 o'clock. The subject will be 'The Stoic Philosophy.' Admission is free, except to a few reserved seats.

THE CHURCHES IN WALES.

[FROM OUR WELSH CORRESPONDENT.]

THE echo of the guns at Liège in August last straightway interfered with the normal activities of the Welsh as of all our other churches; but most of them have been quick to adapt themselves to the necessities of the new situation. When the war started we were about to enter on new missionary efforts at Tredegar and Abertillery. Both places had been visited by the Unitarian Van, and Sunday services had been started at the former place on the conclusion of the van mission. The South-East Wales Society has now taken this movement under its wing, and with the aid of a grant from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association sends pulpit supplies there once a fortnight, while members of the congregation, with commendable zeal, themselves conduct the services every other Sunday. The Society has since organised a series of lectures at Abertillery, given by the Rev. W. T. and Mrs. Lucan Davies of Newport. It has been found, however, that the public mind is at present concerned about other than religious problems, and a second series which had been arranged has been wisely deferred until a more opportune time.

The movement at Tredegar, on the contrary, gives every promise of having come to stay, and the Society will now probably concentrate all its surplus resources on establishing this church on a firm basis.

These missionary efforts are not, however, made at the expense of isolating ourselves entirely from other communions of the Church of Christ. That we are to some measure endeavouring to realise the ideal of the Church Universal may be seen from the following instances of interdenominational fellowship. At the annual meetings of the South-East Wales Unitarian Society, one of the most brilliant and influential of the younger ministers of the Welsh Calvinistic Methodist communion (the Rev. Richard Jones, M.A., Llandinam) opened a conference on the Churches and Social Questions, while a Baptist minister (Prof. Morris Owen) preached at the Annual Meetings of the South Wales Unitarian Association. At the Harvest Festival Services in our church at Trebanos a Wesleyan minister preached in the morning, a Baptist in the afternoon, and a Unitarian in the evening, while still more recently the President of the South-East Wales Unitarian Society preached at the Windsor Road Congregational Church, Cardiff. Thus amidst the travail of nations a closer communion of the churches is being born even in sectarian Wales. And we may well hope that when the Welsh Church Act is consummated there will be a still closer combination of the Christian forces in their war against social wrong, which, after all, is the real battle of the churches.

In the field of social service we are not behind our brethren of other communions. The Rev. T. Arthur Thomas represents the body on the Committee of the Welsh School for Social Service. In May last Miss Margaret Ashton of Manchester made a tour through Glamorganshire, lecturing in various centres under the auspices of the South-East Wales Society on 'Lodging Houses for Working Women,' resulting in a branch of the National Association to be started in at least one centre, and eliciting from the mayor of one of our largest towns—an Anglican—a warm tribute for this signal service done to the community.

But all other activities have been overshadowed by the social activities called for by the war. All our churches have sent their quota of men to join the colours, ranging in number from 26 from Swansea (one of our larger churches) to 8 from Bridgend (one of our smaller). In several of these, such as Aberdare (Highland Place) and Cardiff, the names of these volunteers have been inscribed on a Roll of Honour hung in the school. Mr. Ben Davies, one of our students at Carmarthen College, has joined the R.A.M.C., with the approval of the Presbyterian Board with the intention of returning to conclude his studies on the termination of the war. Collections have been taken in aid of one or other of the relief funds, Llandyssul, Swansea, and others giving a monthly offertory since the outbreak of the war. The various sewing guilds have directed their energies to making comforts for the troops, while our schoolrooms and even our church buildings have been placed at the service of our country. Lectures have been delivered at the Pontypridd Church, under the auspices of the St. John's Ambulance Association, a concert organised by the church for that institution's funds resulting in the sum of £30, while several of the lady members are amongst the qualified nurses. The church at Aberystwyth has been busily engaged in caring for the troops billeted in the town, while the friends at Nottage have turned their schoolroom into a recreation room for the soldiers stationed in their village, a provision which has been greatly appreciated.

The schoolroom attached to the church at Swansea has been furnished by the congregation for the use of Belgian refugees. There are three families now living there—13 in all—and the members of the church, besides providing them with shelter, coal, and light, are subscribing £1 a week, to supplement the husbands' earnings, toward their maintenance. Thus the well-earned reputation of Unitarians for zeal in the public service is being maintained at the present crisis. And while our churches throughout the district are sadly in need of ministers—5 out of the 16 pulpits in Glamorganshire alone being at present vacant—we strive to supply through the ministry of service what we lack in the ministry of the Word.

WINIFRED HOUSE.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE twenty-fourth Annual Meeting of the Home for Invalid Children, Winifred House, was held on Monday last under the presidency of Mr. T. Pallister Young. There was a good attendance.

The report, read by Mr. Ion Pritchard, Hon. Secretary, showed that during the year 1914 forty-three children had been received in the Home. They came mostly from various parts of London, and had been sent through the Invalid Children Aid Association, the hospitals, Charity Organisation Society, and a few on private application. The length of stay was a very important consideration, and, in some cases, extended to months and even years. The patients' average stay during the past twelve months was about twenty-four weeks. The fine summer months often enabled the children to spend the whole daytime in the garden, having their meals, play, and daily lesson in the open air. The little patients learn sewing, knitting, and other simple handwork, in addition to having lessons in reading, writing, and singing. Life in the Home also teaches something in the way of gentleness in behaviour and table manners. The total outlay for the year amounted to £818 16s. 8d. On the basis of this expenditure, each bed in the Home costs about £46 a year, including everything. This is not a large amount compared with the cost in the general hospitals in London, where £70 a year for each bed is considered rather a low figure. The total amount of receipts, together with the balance brought forward from 1913, amounted to £851 5s. 4d., enabling the Treasurer to meet all claims and to carry forward a reduced balance.

In moving the adoption of the report, the Chairman told how he had paid a surprise visit to the Home, and was glad to note two points—the happiness of the children and the neatness and order of the whole place.

Mr. West seconded the resolution, and stated how much he felt his sympathy with suffering developed by mixing among the little patients. The visit gladdened them and gladdened the visitor. The humanising influences of the Home impressed the children, and the impression remained after leaving.

In moving a vote of thanks to the doctors and nurses, the Rev. William Wooding spoke of the changes that had taken place in their status and work during the last century. He referred to the great importance of both professions in the great European war, but reminded his audience that the value of both doctor and nurse had also a place in the little corner of Winifred House, and was of equal importance to the children received there.

The meeting closed with a vote of thanks to the Chairman.

THE Anniversary Meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association will be held, as usual, during Whit week. On Tuesday evening, May 25, there will be a Religious Service; on Wednesday morning, May 26, the Annual Business Meeting and Conference on the work of the Association; the Public Meeting on Wednesday evening will be devoted to a presentation of the moral and religious implications of the war as interpreted by Unitarians. The Conversazione on Thursday evening, May 27, will this year be at Essex Hall, when the whole building will be utilised. The Sunday School Association, the Women's League, the Central Postal Mission, the Ministers' Conference, the Lay-Preachers' Union, and the Unitarian Temperance Association, will also, as in former years, hold their Annual Meetings during Whit week.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Carlisle: Appointment.—Miss Helen L. Phillips, who for the past three years has been in charge of the Unitarian Church at Ilkeston, in conjunction with Christ Church, Nottingham, has accepted an invitation from the congregation of the church at Carlisle, where she will take up duty early in May.

Hindley.—The Rev. R. F. Rattray has begun his ministry at the Presbyterian Chapel, and received an encouraging welcome from the congregation and the various institutions connected with the Sunday School.

Leeds.—The Rev. H. D. Roberts writes as follows:—

"The reporter of my sermon at Mill Hill Chapel, Leeds, has failed to note that I distinctly said it was Prof. Oncken (not Eucken) who reported the conversation with Lord Haldane regarding Germany being 'his spiritual home.'"

London: Essex Hall.—The first of a series of four midday services was held at Essex Hall on Wednesday, March 10. Dr. James Drummond of Oxford, was the preacher. There was a very fair attendance. The services, which last from 1.15 to 1.50, will be continued on March 17, 24, and 31. A special invitation has been issued to business and professional men.

London: Finchley.—On Wednesday, March 3, the Finchley Branch of the Women's League held a "Neighbourhood Meeting" at Granville Hall, to which members of other London Branches were invited as well as the Finchley congregation; the invitation included men as well as women, and 74 were present altogether. A lecture was given by Mrs. Roberts, of Liverpool, on "The Love Story of Robert Browning"; Mrs. Herbert Smith, of Hampstead, was in the chair. The lecture was greatly appreciated. Mrs. Roberts treated her subject in a very tender and beautiful way, and there were flashes of humour now and then which added to the charm of the lecture. A hearty vote of thanks, moved by Dr. Blake Odgers, ended a very successful meeting.

London: Kentish Town.—The Rev. Herman Haugerud, minister of the Unitarian Church, Christiania, Norway, will preach at the Clarence Road Church next Sunday evening, March 14, at 7 P.M.

London, Ilford.—At the recent Annual Meeting of the Ilford Branch of the Women's League the officers were re-elected, and a very encouraging report of the year's work was read. During the autumn the members have been engaged in sewing for the Red Cross Society, their work being sent to Essex Hall for distribution, and a large quantity of clothing has been forwarded to the Belgian Relief Committee. It had been decided to give a donation to John Pound's Home, the money being received from Miss Keeler, whose Girls' Guild has contributed to the Home in past years. In the course of the evening, Miss H. Brooke Herford, Organizing Secretary, gave an interesting account of the work which is being done by the League in many parts of the world, especially through the Fellowship and International Sections. The latter branch has been instrumental since the war broke out in re-uniting many friends and relatives who have been separated and prevented from corresponding with each other.

Midlands' Guilds' Union.—A United Meeting of the Midland Guilds' Union was held at Coseley on Saturday last, March 6. Guild members were present from the Old Meeting Church and the Church of the Messiah, Birmingham, Walsall, Oldbury, Wolverhampton, Lye, Moseley, Dudley, and Coseley. The Rev. J. Morgan Whiteman opened the discussion on 'Belief versus Creed,' in which the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, J. A. Shaw, H. C. Hawkins, Mr. Williams - Price, Miss Twist, and the Rev. E. Glyn Evans took part.

Parkstone.—At the suggestion of the Southern Unitarian Association, Mr. Clement Ryley of Wimborne, will conduct the Sunday Evening Services at Emerson Hall, commencing on April 2.

Pontypridd.—The Rev. T. Eric Davies, Congregational minister at Treorchy, having satisfied the South Wales Advisory Committee, has accepted an invitation to the pastorate of the Unitarian Church, and will enter upon his ministry on April 18.

Sidmouth.—The Rev. T. Bowen Evans, M.A., has accepted the unanimous invitation of the Committee and congregation of the Old Meeting, Sidmouth, to become their regular minister.

Stratford.—The Annual Meeting of the Congregation of the West Ham Lane Unitarian Church was held on February 25. Mr. A. Savage Cooper in the chair. The Report showed that the church activities had been well maintained, and that the actual membership had slightly increased. The Church Guild had considerably increased its membership, and the Band of Hope had been re-organised under the title of The Independent Order of Young Christian Citizens, Lindsey Lodge. The West Ham Troop of Boy Scouts now has a roll of fifty, the largest number that can be accommodated. A falling off in the normal income is attributable, no doubt, to the general depression caused by the war, but Mr. Percival Chalk, the Pioneer Preacher in charge, pointed out that there had been a great improvement in the institutional work, and that if the same spirit of devotion is shown in the future as in the past, the difficulties of the present time can be overcome. Sister Seymour gave an account of the work carried on by herself and Sister Knight in connection with the Church, and as its representatives on the West Ham Corporation War Distress Committee. Eleven members of the Church or old scholars have joined the colours.

The Rev. W. R. Shanks, Holbeck, Leeds, writes:—"A number of Troops of Boy Scouts now exist in connection with our Sunday Schools in various parts of the country, and on the suggestion of one of the leaders of the movement, who believes that the Free Churches of England can, with great advantage, encourage the organisation, I am preparing a register of troops with names and addresses of scoutmasters. I shall be glad if scoutmasters of troops of Unitarian boys will send me particulars of their headquarters, officers' names, and numbers of scouts."

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

AN INCIDENT AT LUCKNOW.

The part which India is playing in the present conflict will not be forgotten when her claim for opportunities of self-development are voiced once more after the war is over. The sacrifices which her people have made for the Empire have already won the respect of many who were formerly inclined to speak of Indian aspirations with impatience, if not indifference, and a little incident narrated in a letter received by a correspondent is significant of the welcome change that has taken place. A train of wounded men passing through Lucknow was met by several doctors and men of note, and as it arrived at the platform the English of all ranks took off their hats, a thing which had never been done before.

THE AUSTRALIAN CHURCH.

The Commonweal, published by Dr. Strong, of Melbourne, contains the Annual Report for 1914 of the Australian Church, which is described as a "free, progressive, and unsectarian Religious Brotherhood, held together by a common religious spirit of trust, hope, and love towards God and man and a common endeavour after Christian life and practice, untrammelled by a final dogmatic theological creed." The Church has suffered a good deal as a result of the war, and Dr. Strong, who has been visiting the homeland after a long period of unbroken service, was greatly missed during his seven months' absence; but the congregation is pervaded by a spirit of courage and hope which the present crisis has really increased, opening up, as it does; so many fresh fields of spiritual activity, and it is felt that the times are ripe for strenuous work and the closer application of Christian principles to the world's problems. During the past year the Social Improvement and Friendly Aid Society in connection with the church has affiliated itself with other societies in order to share effectively in useful endeavours for the promotion of civic welfare, and the Peace Movement, the care of neglected or unmanageable boys, the study of criminology, the question of unemployment and the work of the Women's National Council have received its special attention.

THE WOMEN'S MOVEMENT AND WAR AND PEACE.

Three important meetings will be held at the Central Hall, Westminster, on Monday, March 22, when 'The Religious Aspect of the Women's Movement in its Relation to War and Peace,' will be discussed. The object is not to deal with the present war, but to consider the contribution of women to the establishment of a Christian civilisation. The first meeting will be at 11 o'clock, the second at 2.30, and the third at 6 p.m. The speakers include Dr. Orchard, Dr. Percy Dearmer, Miss Barbara McKenzie, Mrs. Bruce Glasier, Miss Maude Royden, Mr. H. W. Nevinston, Dr. Henry T. Hodgkin, and the Bishop of Lincoln, and the chair will be occupied by the Rev. W. Temple. Copies of the programme giving full details as to the arrangements, price of tickets, &c., will be sent on application by Miss Lucy Gardner, Hon. Secretary, 92, St. George's Square, S.W.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.

ONCE again our Belgian Hospital Fund has made satisfactory progress. We cannot express in terms of money the value of the clothing sent to us, but it represents a large sum. We are deeply grateful to the churches and individuals who have helped so lavishly. Hitherto our appeal has been made with very little personal canvassing; but we feel that the time has come when we must ask some of our readers to help us in this way if we are to meet the demands made upon the Fund. With this object in view, the article by Mrs. Bernard Allen, which appeared in our last issue, has been reprinted as a leaflet for distribution. Will ministers, church secretaries, sewing circles, and others who think they can use some of the leaflets to advantage, apply to Mrs. Allen for them?

MANY people feel that the speech of Lord Kitchener, with its note of serious warning, did not come a moment too soon. The restlessness in the labour world, and the employment of the business opportunities of the war for private ends, have caused a good deal of anxiety, and it was time for a clear trumpet call to the nation to forget personal interests and do its duty. At the same time, the speech gives no ground for panic, and certainly was not meant to have that effect. There is every sign that the Government has the situation well in hand. We may be confident that it did not speak anxiously at an earlier date owing to carelessness or miscalculation, but simply because this is, exactly the right moment to speak. Mr. Asquith and Lord Kitchener are not men who leave anything to chance.

OF course, the wiseacres are all busy, saying that we ought to have been warned long ago. They would have commandeered factories and regulated supplies at the beginning of the war. But many of the people who attack the Government in this strain would have been the first to resent such drastic legislation and to denounce it as Socialism. It is the chastening experience of the last few months, and the realisation that for all of us the conditions of life have undergone a fundamental change, which have made it possible for the nation to accept these far-reaching measures without a murmur. It is a signal illustration of wise opportunism and sound political instinct.

IT is really rather amusing the way in which the newspapers trot out their grievances against the censorship on every possible occasion. They have now discovered that it is really at the bottom of the recent labour troubles. If only they had been allowed to manage the war and the dissemination of news in their own way everything would have been different. Every man in the country would have realised the gravity of the situation and braced himself to do his share without grumbling. We have little confidence that in these circumstances the accounts which reached us would have been more veracious in their details or more terrible in their warnings than they actually have been. For months the Daily Press has overflowed with war news and war pictures, and there have been the long casualty lists. But for a large number of people who are hardly conscious of having modified their daily habits it is still an engrossing pageant of heroism and horror in the newspapers. Our own country has not felt the hand of the spoiler, and people have gone about with smiling faces, saying "Business as usual." Now the real terror of the war has dawned upon us and stabbed us broad awake.

* * *

MR. LLOYD GEORGE has adopted exactly the right tone in commending the new business arrangements with the Government. He has disdained to cajole the capitalist or to flatter the wage-earner. To one and all he has made the same appeal of a lofty and broad-minded patriotism. He knows that there are going to be hard times for everybody—that is the price of freedom and victory—and he has the courage to say so. There is to be no haggling for compensation, and no striking for better wages. In all cases the Government intend to do what is equitable, and profits for the manufacture of war material will be distributed as fairly as possible. To make this programme quite just a further step ought to be taken in the direction of allocating some of the profits to the relief of taxation, and probably this will be kept in view. It is obviously unfair that the section of the people who can be employed upon business connected directly with the war should be placed in a position of financial privilege, while those who carry on the work of the country in other directions—teachers, artists, writers, small professional men—are taxed into poverty.

THESE principles, which were enunciated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in an eloquent speech in the House of Commons last week, were elaborated by him in greater detail at a conference between representatives of the great Government departments and trade union leaders on Wednesday. Having announced their intention to impose upon employers a limitation of profits, he pointed out that on the side of labour they must ask that in all cases work should go on while differences about wages are being adjusted, and there must be no restriction of output owing to a pedantic adherence to trade-union regulations. With his usual instinct for the human realities of a situation he prepared the way for his financial arguments by the following statement of the urgency of the need:—

The French told me in France, when I was there, that by a concentration of fire upon a particular point, they were able to achieve their purpose with one-tenth of the loss of life which they otherwise would have needed to accomplish that object. So that the turning out of munitions of war not merely means success, but it means the saving of lives; and, as we are all making our contribution in that respect, from every class, without distinction, in sending those who are related to us to the war, we are anxious to see our country win, and we are also anxious to save the lives of our people. That is why it is not merely urgent that we should get an increased output; it is urgent that we should accelerate it. Every month that there is delay in the output may mean two or three months added to the duration of the war, with all its horrors.

THE JOCKEY CLUB has spoken, and racing is to go on, not quite as usual, but in what is known in Court circles as half-mourning. The decision looks like a rather unwilling concession to public opinion. A race meeting is a gay society function, for which sensible people will be in no mood this year. It is also the happy hunting ground of touts, book-makers, and the whole undesirable gang of financial spongers who are a discredit to us at all times, and now would be a scandalous disgrace. The defenders of the "national sport" have made much of the fact that horse-breeding is an important industry. Is it too late to appeal to them to take the necessary step to make it a reputable industry as well by placing a ban upon the book-maker? We have no wish to put obstacles in the way of suitable relaxation during the war, but we have a strong repugnance to squandering money on betting and sordid pleasures, at a time when we ought to find our happiness in helping, and to be temperate in all things.

At the same time, we recognise with Mr. Ernest Barker, who writes a letter to The Times on 'New Puritans,' that our minds cannot always live in a state of tension. "When we resolve to live tensely, we are in danger of becoming hypocrites to ourselves and censors to others." There is also, as he points out, a danger of swift reaction if we push regulation too far. He asks us to consider whether "it is, perhaps, true that just as we needed cleansing lest we perished of pleasure, so we need cheering lest we perish of pain."

Tragic sensibility [he says] varies from man to man and from class to class. It would be a pity to legislate for the multitude of the working men of England in terms of the sensibility of the man of taste. In a war which is engulfing three millions of the manhood of England our hearts are all engaged, whether we be rich or poor, high or low.... The apostle who thought that all meats were lawful nevertheless held that we ought not to eat to the offending of the brethren. And the one form of Puritanism that I will practise with alacrity is abstention from any pleasure to indulge in which might seem to our brethren in arms in dear and honoured France to be a thing unseemly. Here I will meet the demands of the Puritan in the gate. On other grounds I am critical. I love to think of Sir Thomas More dying with a jest. I long to think that my country, of which I was never more proud than I am now, can be as gaily gallant in great things as it can be mournfully serious in little things. I would have us meet the unseen with a cheer, and even with a smile, provided that no man is offended thereby.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY has written a very sensible letter in reply to the suggestion of Sir Edward Clarke that the clergy should make a special vow of total abstinence during the war. He points out that it is a matter in which it is undesirable to make any distinction between the clergy and the laity.

You are aware [he writes] that in October last I made public appeal throughout England, not to the clergy only, but to people generally, that we should be total abstainers during the continuance of the war. Of course, by the very making of my appeal I declared my own abstinence. The response, though considerable, has been less than I had hoped for. You think that if the bishops and clergy would all abstain the effect on the country would be immediate and far-reaching. I hope you are right, but I think myself that any distinction between clergy and laity in such a matter is rather unfortunate, and I doubt whether those whom it is most important that we should help would be greatly stirred, or even interested, by the fact that bishops and clergy (the great proportion of whom are already life abstainers) were making such a promise. My appeal last October was to people generally; yours on March 5 was to the clergy. The greater includes the less. I am most anxious that we should leave nothing undone which can be helpful at this time in face of a very real danger. I think we want drastic legislation or drastic action on the part of the authorities to whom the emergency legislation has given unusual powers. England ought not to lag behind her Allies in so great a matter at this solemn time.

WE have nothing to modify in the comment which we made last week upon the proposed compromise on the Welsh Church Bill. By an unfortunate mischance the Welsh members were not consulted before the announcement was made of the Government's intentions. In consequence, some angry feeling has been aroused, which has tended to obscure the spirit of moderation and kindliness in which the compromise has been conceived. The postponement of its consideration till after the Easter recess will give time for reflection, and we hope that then some of the critics will acknowledge that it is a time when men ought to be generous to their political opponents, and not to be too suspicious that in pleading for delay they may only be playing a shifty party game. It is on the face of it absurd that a measure of delay, which has won the approval of Mr. Lloyd George and Mr. McKenna, can be hostile or even indifferent to the best interests of the Welsh people.

* * *

In an interesting article in The English Review Mr. Frederic Harrison discourses pleasantly about 'The Old Books in War Time.' Nothing, he tells us, has so calmed and refreshed his spirit as commerce with his favourite books. "Solitary walks, lovely scenes, intimate exchange of thoughts—all these made the present more irrepressible, more inexplicable, more black, more red. One thing only remained. I found it. In my old books, and all they recalled, all they told, all they promised—I found peace and rest." And so he praises once again the healing virtues of Homer and Virgil, of Sophocles and Theocritus. It would be interesting to learn what has been the experience of our readers in this matter. Into what books have they dived for a few moments of forgetfulness and renewal of heart amid the absorbing anxieties of the present? We know of one man who finds much of the help he needs in prowling in his library among the immortal dead. Long and exacting tasks of reading are impossible, but he turns with delight to the old English essayists, so ripe in their wisdom, so sane, and often so humorous in their view of life, prompted, no doubt, in part by the rich suggestiveness of Prof. Hugh Walker's book, 'The English Essay and Essayists' (J. M. Dent & Sons, 5s. net), and the 'Essays of Addison,' edited by Sir James Frazer (Macmillan & Co., 2 vols., 8s. net), which have come recently into his hands. How, we wonder, has it been with others?

LIBERTY OF DISCUSSION.

MEN of action are often impatient of the theorists, who insist upon discussing everything. What is the use, they say, of this endless warfare of words, when the need of the moment is to get things done. People of this kind are equally impatient of abstract questions of right and wrong, of religious speculation, and of debates in Parliament. They distrust the democracy of thought and reserve all their admiration for the fixed principles of the strong man. In one of his penetrating essays Walter Bagehot has shown how discussion is the safeguard of liberty and the best guarantee we possess of orderly progress.

A Government by discussion [he says], if it can be borne, at once breaks down the yoke of fixed custom. The idea of the two is inconsistent. As far as it goes, the mere putting up of a subject to discussion, with the object of being guided by that discussion, is a clear admission that that subject is by no means settled by established rule, and that men are free to choose in it. It is an admission, too, that there is no sacred authority—no one transcendent and divinely appointed man whom in that matter the community is bound to obey.... Once effectually submit a subject to that ordeal, and you can never withdraw it again; you can never again clothe it with mystery, or fence it by consecration; it remains for ever open to free choice, and exposed to profane deliberation.

To this plain statement of principle we give our hearty assent. To a journal like THE INQUIRER it is, indeed, the breath of life. It has always been our ambition to offer an equal opportunity to a great variety of opinions, and to exhibit a temper of happy tolerance towards them all, combined with the earnest advocacy of convictions and principles of our own. But obviously this imposes a rigorous discipline both upon those who read and those who write. The reader must not expect to find merely an echo of his own opinions. He must be prepared for the stimulus of dissent. If he disagrees, his disagreement ought to be based upon something better than the prejudice of a closed mind. A challenge to formulate the grounds of his objection is not to be dismissed with anger or resentment, for it is often the best spur to clear faith and fruitful action.

But the responsibility of those who write is in many respects even greater. Discussion, if it is to minister to something better than personal vanity and the advertisement of our own opinions, must be guided by adequate knowledge and the spirit of wisdom and moderation. This means that it must have some connection with vital interests and practical possibilities. Otherwise no man of large and liberal mind will take part in it. He will not, for instance, waste his breath in discussing the government of the world by archangels, or the extension of the franchise to children of two years old. But there are numerous other questions which require good judgment in regard to their timeliness and their practical utility before they can enter into the domain of animated discussion at all. It is no infringement of liberty if we refuse to allow correspondence in our columns upon the benefits of being conquered and the substitution of Prussian autocracy for English Parliamentary Government. These things do not bite into the public mind. They have no breath of moral reality about them. We are justified in dismissing them without more ado as ineffectual abstractions divorced from any sound instinct for practical duty. For it is the business of discussion to make us capable of wise and vigorous action, not to fill us with paralysing scruples. It should endow us with the quality of strength, combined with good sense, which Bagehot has described as "animated moderation."

It is plain [he says] that this is a quality which as much as, if not more than, any other multiplies good results in practical life. It enables men to see what is good; it gives them intellect enough for sufficient perception; but it does not make men all intellect; it does not "sicken them o'er with the pale cast of thought"; it enables them to do the things they see to be good as well as to see that they are good. And it is plain that a government by popular discussion tends to produce this quality. A strongly idiosyncratic mind, violently disposed to extremes of opinion, is soon weeded out of political life, and a bodiless thinker, an ineffectual scholar, cannot even live there for a day. A vigorous moderateness in mind and body is the rule of a polity which works by discussion; and, upon the whole, it is the kind of temper most suited to the active life of such a being as man in such a world as the present one.

In the last place, in our devotion to some abstract doctrine of freedom, we must not overlook the fact that there are occasions when discussion may be not only untimely, but also actively harmful. So long as it can help to determine the course of policy or to shape some great programme of action which lies ahead of us, let it go on with all the vigour which we can command. But when once a man or a nation is committed irrevocably there can be no looking back, and the discussion of all the alternatives which have been decisively rejected can lead to little else but confusion of mind and paralysis of will. This is the position in which we find ourselves to-day. We have embarked upon the greatest and most terrible enterprise to which any country ever set its hand. There is no course open to us but to go on with all the strength at our command till we bring it to a triumphant conclusion. To indulge in any kind of discussion which damps down the fires of the spirit and encourages the mood of intellectual hesitation is to court disaster and deserve defeat. If at the present moment we have to discourage discussion of that kind in our columns, let it not be said that we are false to any principle of liberty. It is an obligation imposed upon us by our loyalty to freedom, for freedom itself is only to be esteemed one of the priceless treasures of the soul when it fits us to serve a cause and to throw ourselves, without backward glances or visionary fears, into the effective discharge of our duty.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

THE CHURCH OF GOD.

It's a Coal from God's Altar must kindle our Fire: and without Fire, true Fire, no acceptable Sacrifice.... Let us chuse, therefore, to commune where there is the warmest Sense of Religion; where Devotion exceeds Formality, and Practice most corresponds with Profession; and where there is at least as much Charity as Zeal; for where this Society is to be found, there shall we find the Church of God.... The Humble, Meek, Merciful, Just, Pious, and Devout Souls, are everywhere of one Religion; and when Death has taken off the Mask, they will know one another, tho' the divers Liveries they wear here makes them strangers.—WILLIAM PENN.

Oh, make my anger pure—let no worst wrong

Rouse in me the old niggard selfishness.

Give me Thine indignation—which is love

Turned on the evil that would part love's throng;

Thy anger scathes because it needs must bless,

Gathering into union calm and strong

All things on earth, and under, and above.

Make my forgiveness downright—such as I

Should perish if I did not have from Thee;

I let the wrong go, withered up and dry,

Cursed with divine forgetfulness in me.

'Tis but self-pity, pleasant, mean and sly,

Low whispering bids the paltry memory live:—

What am I brother for, but to forgive?

Lord, I forgive—and step in unto Thee.

GEORGE MACDONALD.

LORD GOD ALMIGHTY, who pitiest Thy children more than any earthly father, pity us all, we beseech Thee, in these solemn days of our country's high and dangerous duty. Our hearts are known to Thee. According to the rectitude of our aims and the sincerity of our professions, be it done unto us, O God of justice and of mercy! Humbly believing ourselves to be the agents of divine judgment, in us let all human resentments and national hatreds cease; and protect our soldiers and our sailors, our counsellors and our rulers, so that justice may redeem their necessity, and mercy temper their justice. Let pity dwell within us for the transgressions of our enemies; and teach us to forgive as we would be forgiven. And in all lands multiply the number of good and kindly men who have the desire and wisdom to spread peace on earth, and number us in their holy fellowship; that Thy Will may be done on earth, as it is in heaven. Amen.

THE TOLL OF LIFE.

"ALL that a man hath will he give for his life." "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends." The profound untruth of the first of these sayings, appropriately put into the mouth of Satan; the supreme truth and beauty of the second, have rarely been more strikingly evident among us than at the present moment. They both refer to the physical bodily life, not to that deeper life which we call spiritual, which is our true life. Day by day we are seeing that men, common people like ourselves, will not part with their spiritual possessions of loyalty, honour, liberty, in order to preserve their bodily lives; that they will lay down those lives for the sake of their country and their friends.

We are living in a very carnival of death. We cannot free ourselves from the vision of it. It haunts our thoughts. Imagination carries us across the Channel to battlefields. We see the reddened snow and the polluted streams. We breathe the tainted air. We shudder as we read of the sinking ships and the carnage of the guns. The splendid tales of heroism avail but little to mitigate the horror of it all. We are in some danger of becoming unmanned and irresolute through dwelling on this awful aspect of the war—we at home, that is, not those who are enduring it there. We are tempted to demand that it be stopped at all cost and whatever the result. Yet we well know that this cannot be done yet, except on payment of a price which must not be paid even for the immediate ending of this terrible thing.

We dare not allow ourselves thus to become faint and feeble in our efforts through pity and horror. We must keep it steadily in mind that for us the only way to end the war is to win the war. On the other hand, we cannot shut our eyes to what is going on; we must not allow ourselves to grow callous to human loss and suffering. We need some way of looking at this aspect of the war which will enable us to avoid these two dangers.

It may be found in remembering that it is one aspect only in keeping steadily in view the whole of which it forms but a part, however terrible. One of our Indian soldiers is reported to have said that this war was not like any ordinary war, but more like the Mahabharat, in which the gods came down and fought with men. He probably had in mind its scale and violence, yet his words suggest a truth which must never be forgotten. It is no ordinary war waged by men against men for territory, for material advantage, or for revenge. Principles of conduct, ideals of life, are struggling with other and widely different principles and ideals. These are the gods in the combat using and inspiring the men. As our opponents might put it, "Kultur" has joined issue with civilisation, and on the result depends the moral and spiritual welfare of the world for generations to come. Shall it be "Kultur" with its gospel of hate and practice of frightfulness? Shall it be civilisation, imperfect, indeed, but with its ideals of goodwill and practices of freedom and toleration? In the presence of spiritual issues so vast, material losses, even of life, bodily pains and sufferings, great and real as they are, become relatively unimportant. To elevate them to the first place is to be guilty of a kind of refined materialism.

Recently I watched a battalion of the new army on the march. They were, for the most part, young City men, who a few months ago had never dreamed that they could be taking up arms or playing any part in such an awful drama. They marched well. Evidently their hearts were in this new part they had to play. One could not but be impressed by a distinct type of look upon their faces, a look of grave determination, as of men who had counted the cost of what they were doing and meant to go through with it. Then some one remarked, "How awful to think that so many of them will be killed." For him that was the outstanding feature of the case. Not so with them. Beyond all doubt they had reckoned with that, and put it behind them as a secondary matter—secondary to the fulfilment of the high purpose which animated them, to the victory of the ideals, the gods with and for which they marched to battle. And they were prepared to lay down their lives for their friends; prepared, too, to do what, for most of them, must be even more terrible, to take the lives of their opponents. For they know, as we know, that only so, in such a case as this, can their own sacrifice be made effective in the defence of their country and their cause.

We do such men a wrong if we allow ourselves to dwell too exclusively on that loss of life as if it were the chief matter to be considered. We do not help them by creating such an atmosphere about them.

Let us then put this terrible aspect of the war into its right place, look at it from the right point of view, and while not forgetting its horror, while doing everything in our power to mitigate the suffering, refuse to be obsessed by it as if it were the only, or even the chief thing to be considered. It is there, and must in no sense be made light of; but there is something else greater and more important there also.

It is not in time of war only that human life is sacrificed in the pursuit of ends not always so worthy as those for which we are now contending. The yearly toll of life in our great industries, notably on the railways and in the mines, is great and terrible. Yet we accept it as justified by the ends in view, subject always to this, that every effort be made to mitigate it. Get rid of it altogether we cannot; but we do not say that there shall be no more coal got, nor trains run; we do not shudderingly decline to travel by rail, or to warm ourselves at our fire-sides. We could conceivably get along without coal and without trains, but we cannot get along in any kind of life worth living without the spiritual goods for which we are now fighting—liberty, good faith, justice to the weak, an ideal of life which is not grossly materialistic. These things were in some danger at home before the war. Now that they are attacked from abroad we are waking up once more to their profound importance, realising that it is better to part with life than to try to live without them.

But it is not a question of losing all life, not the abiding real life. There are those who in the name of religion would brand all fighting, in whatever cause, as indefensible. It is to be feared that by such indiscriminating censure they do but weaken what hold religion has upon their fellow-men. It is better to call our religion to the aid of our faith that the dissolution of the body does not end the life of the spirit, and that he who freely gives his life for what seems to him a great and good cause shall surely save it.

AFTER THE WAR.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—Clearly it is no time to discuss terms of peace, and your columns would doubtless be closed to anything so futile. Further, I am sure that it will be almost universally agreed that the first duty of every one of us at this time is to consider periodically the question: "Am I doing the utmost possible to assist the country in achieving success in the task to which we as a nation are pledged?" Nevertheless, for those who are in training, as well as for those at home, the most engrossing subject for thought and discussion when "off duty" is the possibility of laying the foundations of a lasting peace. Undoubtedly this is mainly a problem in statesmanship, and as in a democratic system worthy of the name the voter must be to some extent a statesman, it is good to see such increasing prominence and support given to such bodies as the Council for the Study of International Relations.

Although very sceptical, I shall not presume to criticise proposals for the abolition of secret diplomacy, the democratic control of foreign policy and such like, but I should like to suggest for consideration the possibility of certain far-reaching and even revolutionary developments in the realms of science which may render war either impossible or unthinkable. Mr. H. G. Wells, in 'The World Set Free,' has fore-shadowed one example in the discovery of means for dissociating matter into its constituent ions suddenly and on a large scale. Many other similar developments are rapidly coming within the range of possibility. Mr. Wells pictures the use of such a discovery in actual warfare, but it is much more likely that the European powers, at any rate, would recognise that it were wiser to take effective steps to prevent wholesale mutual destruction by some organisation of international relations. The advance of science, the free interchange (by congresses and scientific publications) of the results of research, notably in the cure and prevention of disease, and perhaps no less in physics and chemistry have already done much to break down the barriers between nations, and it would be a fitting outcome of such international application of thought and effort, past and future, if it supplied an "elixir of peace." Progress in science has become very rapid (wireless telegraphy, X-rays, and ionization of matter have all been developed in the last eighteen years) and that progress will doubtless be accelerated by the war.

We can expect that the exhaustion resulting from the war will prevent hostilities on a vast scale for several decades at least, and I for one am confident that that period will see fundamental discoveries of natural forces and phenomena hitherto unrecognised. The utilisation of such natural forces and phenomena for the service of man may demand co-ordination and co-operation of institutions, resources, and even governments of the different nations, and this in itself would help to build the structure of peace; and, as hinted in my brother's recent article, there is practically no limit to the tasks which can be undertaken if the nations are forced to face them. Clearly, although "the claims of nationality" may be recognised and preserved, the nations will tend to be brought together to the greatest extent by international but combined efforts to tame and harness newly found natural forces, or to explore new realms in nature, efforts which are independent of nationality and transcend the limits of race and creed. Always an optimist, I am confident now that one of the most powerful factors in securing the desired unity amid diversity will be the necessity for world-wide co-operation in grappling with, and turning to account, powers which may, in our own time, burst forth from the unknown.—Yours, &c.

WELSH DISESTABLISHMENT.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—Permit me to express my dissent from your observations on this subject. The Government's Bill is simply playing into the hands of the Church Party—in England, rather than in Wales, for, in the latter country, there has been noticeable already a disposition to accept the new situation and make the best of it. In the former country, the Church Party have opposed Welsh Disestablishment, not from any particular love of the Church in Wales, but because it will be a precedent for England. Hence the clutching at every possible chance to postpone the dreaded day, in the hope that something would turn up, and the efforts to whittle down disendowment.

The Government Bill gives them, at last, what they have wanted, by providing that the Act shall not come into force until six months after the end of the war. Unless something totally unexpected happens, a General Election must come less than six months after the conclusion of peace, and, if the Church Party, as is quite conceivable, win, then goodbye to Welsh Disestablishment for many a year to come. Moreover, to permit the creating of life-interests between now and the date of operation of the Act gives room for a repetition of the scandals in Ireland in 1869. As against the argument that the war, in its financial effects, will increase the alleged difficulty of replacing the lost endowments—it will take about 1d. a week from each communicant to do that—it should be borne in mind that, owing to the rise in the rate of interest, the disestablished Church will probably benefit by at least £100,000, without reckoning the benefit to individual clergymen by the rise in the price of corn, and, therefore, in the value of tithe-rent charge which will, for some time to come, be one of the consequences of the war. Instead of acquiescing in the Government's Bill, the supporters of Disestablishment should, rather, counter the Archbishop of Canterbury's declaration that he will renew the fight by demanding the disestablishment and disendowment of the Church of England.—Yours, &c.

OUR GIRLS' HOME.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—Your readers will be interested to learn that the extension of our Barleycrofts Girls' Convalescent Home is now nearing completion. We have added six single bedrooms and a bathroom, enlarged the dining-room, and made other improvements. The cost of the structural work, about £400, is promised or in hand. We are now only concerned as to the decorating and furnishing of the new rooms. Ten pounds will cover the cost of a room. It has occurred to us that it would be a charming thing if these rooms could be named after some of the good and gracious women who have adorned our community. There could hardly be a better memorial than one which would serve to bring health and happiness to successive generations of our elder girls and working women. We shall be glad to thus name any of the new rooms in accordance with the wishes of friends who will provide the cost of completion as above, and we shall be further glad to hang a portrait of the lady so commemorated. The Home is worthy of this honoured association, as it is doing excellent work. Since its opening, six years ago, over one thousand guests have stayed in it, girls coming to it from all parts of the country. It is open to all on equal terms. It is the only Home of the sort associated with us. It is practically self-supporting, and yet the charges are kept so low as to bring it within the reach of all. As proof of the affection in which it is held, former guests have subscribed over £50 to the enlargement fund. The Home is a fine stone building, standing in five acres of ground in the healthy High Peak of Derbyshire, than which hardly any more suitable site could be found.

May we earnestly appeal for help in the above or any other way.—Yours, &c.,

FOR THE CHILDREN.

THE STORY OF DANTE.

I.—DANTE AND BEATRICE.

WE are all interested in patriots, and have been reading lately about the Italian soldier-patriot Garibaldi. Have you heard of the Italian poet-patriot Dante?

Six hundred years ago Dante wrote a great poem which is very well known in other countries besides Italy. Dante, too, was an exile; and, more lonely than Garibaldi, he died in exile, mourning for the evil state of Italy. His great poem, however, ends happily, and because it did not move to a terrible ending like a tragedy, but moved from sorrow to joy, Dante called it 'The Divine Comedy.'

The story of this great poem grew out of Dante's memories in later life of something that happened in his early boyhood in his native city of Florence. This was no great catastrophe, like the terrible earthquake that has lately destroyed so many lives and so many homes in Italy. It was no great war for liberty such as that in Garibaldi's time, or the war now waged by the Allies. It was no public event at all. It was not even a boyish adventure that lingered in Dante's memory. It was just a meeting between two children that left a picture in his mind never to be forgotten.

Dante tells the story in his first little book. When he was "almost at the end of his ninth year," he met a beautiful girl of his own age, called Beatrice. She appeared to him "clothed in most noble hue, a subdued and modest crimson, girdled and adorned after the fashion that was becoming to her most tender age." From that time onwards Dante loved her, looked up to her with reverence almost as to an angel. She was his ideal of all that is noble and pure and holy, and as he grew up he wrote poems about his "gentle lady," and his love for her.

When Dante and Beatrice were grown up—just "twice nine years old"—they met again, as Dante tells us. At the ninth hour of the day he was standing on a bridge over the River Arno in Florence. And "it came to pass that this wondrous lady appeared to him clothed in hue of purest white in the midst of two gentle ladies who were of fuller age." Of her gentle courtesy, to his intense joy, she granted him a greeting, a salutation. A picture by a modern English artist represents, it seems, the moment before the salutation, when Beatrice and her companions are approaching Dante as he stands on the bridge humbly waiting for his "gentle lady" to pass.

My lady looks so gentle and so pure
When yielding salutation by the way That the tongue trembles and has nought to say.

Dante was humbled, and happy at this recognition. Afterwards, however, Beatrice was not pleased with him, and when they met again she denied him her salutation. Dante was so ashamed and distressed that on returning home, tired out, he "fell asleep," he tells us, "like a little beaten, sobbing child." Notice this picture of a child sobbing itself to sleep after punishment. Was this a memory from his own childhood or a picture of some child he had noticed?

Dante believed that obedience and shame were the two things most needful for young people—as for older ones. His thoughts of Beatrice always made him feel his own unworthiness. In this way she became linked in his mind with shame and repentance, and also with visions of a better, more ideal life. We guess this from the little book describing his meetings with Beatrice—the meeting in childhood, the meeting of the salutation, and the meeting of the salutation denied. Dante saw her in a dream with the Angel of Love. Others, too, he tells us, thought of her almost as an angel. As she passed by, "it was said of many, 'This is not a woman, but one of the beautiful angels of heaven.'"

This little book tells us also of a dream of Beatrice that came to Dante when he was weak with illness. It was a sad dream, so sad that in his sleep he wept, and wakened weeping. He thought he saw his gentle lady lying in the sleep of death. This is represented in the famous picture 'Dante's Dream.'

On the death of Beatrice, which happened not long afterwards, Dante sought comfort in his grief by writing the little book which we have mentioned, telling the story of his love and devotion to her. He put in the right places in the story all the poems which he had written about Beatrice at different times, and he called the book 'The New Life.'

Dante now thought of Beatrice as "a citizen of eternal life":—

Beatrice has gone up into high Heaven,
The kingdom where the angels are at peace;
And lives with them; and to her friends is dead.

Not by the frost of winter was she driven Away like others; nor by summer-heats;
But through a perfect gentleness, instead.

He had a vision of her as once more a child in the crimson robe in which he had seen her first, and again another more wonderful vision—so wonderful that he determined to "say nothing further of this most blessed one, until such time as he could discourse more worthily concerning her." The book ends with the hope that if he studies all he can, he may some day be worthy to write a poem on this last most glorious vision that he has seen of Beatrice. The great poem 'The Divine Comedy,' which moves towards the light and ends in a glorious vision of Beatrice in the high heavens, was the fulfilment in Dante's last years of this early hope.

MEMORIAL NOTICE.

MRS. RUSSELL SWANWICK.

No one who knew Mrs. Russell Swanwick can help wishing that some impress of her radiant personality could be perpetuated, so that her death, which must cast so deep a shadow over her own circle, might release the light of her spirit from the narrower precincts within which it shone and make it a common possession. And though such wishes mock themselves, yet even as they proclaim their own vanity they refuse to abate their insistence.

Clara Bruce, born on St. Patrick's day in 1847, was the niece of Anna Swanwick (her future husband being her second cousin) and the daughter of the next younger sister Mary Bruce, née Swanwick. The biographies of mother and daughter alike may be summarised in the "common" words "daughter, sister, wife, mother," but "particularised" by the glowing memories, associations, and affections which press upon the minds of those who knew them as each word is pronounced, and as the living personality irradiates them. Many of our readers remember Mrs. Bruce, retaining in extreme old age the light step, the erect form, the beautiful and animated features which told of a spirit that had gathered and reflected beauty and joy through nine decades and had broken through heaviest bereavement and affliction, chastened, but undimmed.

In Clara, her seventh child and fourth daughter, her spirit lived again. The child, as her mother (her first teacher) recorded "seemed to acquire knowledge almost by intuition." She learned to read before any one had begun to teach her, and had discovered Thackeray all by herself at an age when most children are begging some one to read fairy tales to them. After a happy childhood, alternating between London and the seaside—spent in closest companionship with her brother William Wallace (only about a year her senior), whose memory and record of public work are still fresh among us—she had ample opportunities, at school and college and amongst the wide circle of her Aunt Anna's acquaintance, of cultivating and indulging her tastes for music, science, and, above all, painting and literature, and learning to back and solidify her brilliant gifts by habits of methodic perseverance. Directness of vision, courage, the tact that is born of sympathy, and sensitiveness to every kind of beauty and joy, came to her by nature and found in her surroundings a happy training ground.

Are gains and growth normally continuous and gradual, and losses catastrophic? How else should it be that the periods of even such a favoured life seem to be almost as often punctuated by sorrows as by joys? When Clara Bruce was eight years old she lost her eldest sister, a girl of eighteen; and the impression of that sorrow and the deeper realisation of the bond between mother and children that it brought with it were amongst the abiding influences of her life. She was about seventeen when her father, still in his full manhood and strength, died of bronchitis. Five years later her marriage to her second cousin Russell Swanwick, only son of the late Frederick Swanwick of Whittington, George Stephenson's pupil, opened to her a new life, full of bright hopes and realisations; but a minor strain mingled with the music even here, for her quiet wedding took place under the shadow of a loss. Her brother Alexander, just entering on his career as a medical man, had recently died of a fever. The beautiful marble medallion at the entrance of the Library of University College, in Gower Street, preserves the record of the features in which that choice spirit was enshrined. The inscription tells of his college honours, of the respect and admiration he had won from his teachers and fellow-students, and of the high hopes that were cut short when he died. But one by one the hearts are ceasing to beat in which the living record remains to interpret the letters on the stone.

Mr. Russell Swanwick had studied at the Royal Agricultural College, near Cirencester, and at the time of his marriage he was tenant of the "College Farm." It was there that Mrs. Swanwick spent her married life, befriending generations of students at the college, as well as all others that she came into contact with. It would be easy to tell of Shakespeare readings and what else made her house a centre of intellectual life, of her benevolences, including recently her care for Belgian exiles in the midst of heaviest trials of her own, of her presidency of the district branch of the Women's Liberal Association, of the unflinching courage, with which, loyally supported by her husband, she upheld principles, without apology or compromise, that a less ardent spirit would have toned down into something nearer to the "good form" of the surroundings. It is easy to tell all this, but it all tells nothing; for it does not tell of the spirit always "in tune with what is lovely, pure, and noble," of the graciousness that mellowed rather than tempered zeal, of the clean, clear-cut insight and sense of right and wrong, to which stupidity, perverseness, and slipperiness always remained unnatural and almost incredible. To the wavering and the laggard it was a tonic to come into her presence. To the harassed, the afflicted and the broken she was, "as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land," and "you never spoke to her about any public matter without feeling the whole thing lifted on to a plane of absolutely selfless devotion to duty." The word that rises most naturally to the lips of those who knew her best is "radiant."

The last landmark in her life is again a sorrow. A gallant son, her youngest but one, was shot in the fighting line in the first phases of the present war. A brief notice of him—from her own hand it may now be said—appeared in these columns. She leaves, besides sisters and many friends and relatives, a husband, three sons, and a daughter to mourn her death and to give thanks for her life.

EAST CHESHIRE CHRISTIAN UNION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE ANNUAL MEETING of the East Cheshire Christian Union was held at Glossop on Saturday, March 6. The proceedings opened with a Devotional Service in the Church at 3.30, the Rev. G. A. Payne of Knutsford being the preacher. The Business Meeting followed, at which the Annual Report and Balance Sheet, together with reports from aided Churches, were adopted. In the absence of the Rev. H. E. Dowson, in consequence of illness, the chair was taken by Mr. J. Hall Brooks. A vote of sympathy with the President and the Treasurer in their illness was passed. The officers were re-elected as follows: President, the Rev. H. E. Dowson; Treasurer, Mr. W. Hudson;

Secretary, the Rev. J. Ellis. A Public Meeting was held in the Church in the evening. The Mayoress of Glossop (Mrs. Partington) presided, and in a felicitous speech gave a cordial welcome to the speakers and the visitors.

The Rev. W. Jellie said that his intimacy with the men from our Churches who had joined the forces for this war, and his observation of the generous spirit of the people who had come to their assistance, impressed him profoundly. When the story of the war came to be written one of the most interesting chapters would be that which dealt with voluntary giving. He found the conduct of the men splendid. He found, also, good people eagerly ready to make their homes centres of kindly influence. He gave touching illustrations of the moral uplift which had come as a result of good billeting. What would become of these men after the war? Some would go back to their ordinary occupations. Many would remain with the colours. Many would go to populate the waste places of the earth in distant Colonies. What would be the duty of the Churches? It would be to follow them with the guidance, fellowship, and support of religion.

Councillor Margaret Ashton spoke on 'Morality and Patriotism.' She said it was the hardest duty of a patriot, at this time, to see where our country was in the right, and where it was not. War was wrong. They were not able, at that moment, to choose a right course. A hundred men in Europe had plunged the nations into this seething turmoil. They must end this war for the benefit of the world to come. War generally led to further war because the settlement was unjust. They must see to it that the settlement of this war was so just as not to get advantage by our power. They must give up what was unjust to the rest of the world. They must neutralise the sea. They must stand for a right settlement, whether it suited them or not. The finest thing they could do as a nation, in the reconstruction which must follow the war, was to set their own house in order. They, in their Churches, must present the ideal of the higher patriotism to the world. True patriotism was to cultivate the sense of right.

Mr. Ronald P. Jones spoke as Chairman of the Home Mission Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and as Treasurer of the Sustentation Fund. He said the Sustentation Fund had relieved the Unitarian Association of responsibility for many grant-aided Churches, but the managers expected those Churches to continue to do their best to maintain their institutions. He urged that if it is necessary for business to go on as usual in these testing times, it is even more necessary for Church life to abound more and more. It would be a sad reflection, if, when the men who have so nobly responded to the call to service return home again, they should find the Churches reduced in vigour because those left behind have been preoccupied in thinking about the war. The Churches had a great opportunity now in the greater seriousness that has come over the nation. The complaint had often been made that one of the greatest obstacles to church-going was the desire for amusement. That had gone. The war had evoked a wonderful response in generous giving—the basis of religion according to St. James. The great duty of the Churches was to prepare the minds of the nation for the coming peace. They must do this by going to the people in such a spirit of helpfulness and brotherliness as is now manifest in present sacrifice on all hands. They must get a warm and cheerful atmosphere in their Church and school buildings, and turn away from the cheerless and forbidding puritan conditions. He commended the naval formula "carry on" as a motto for Churches.

The Rev. John Ellis proposed a vote of thanks to the speakers, the chairman, and the vocalists. Members of the choir gave excellent selections of music at the afternoon service and during the evening.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

A SPECIAL MEETING of the Committee was held on the 12th inst. at Dr. Williams's Library, London, to consider further the question of holding the triennial meetings of the Conference this year. After full consideration of the various written opinions of members unable to attend, and of Resolutions passed by four bodies of ministers, it was decided that meetings of the Conference on a modified scale be held in London on September 28 and 29 to include a religious service, a public meeting, the business meeting, and a session for the report on public worship. A Sub-Committee was appointed to draft the necessary arrangements, and the next meeting of the Committee was fixed for the Wednesday afternoon in Whit week.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Astley.—The chapel which has been closed for repairs and beautifying was reopened on Sunday. A Special Service was held in the afternoon, conducted by the Rev. Peter Holt. There was a good attendance. A collection was made in aid of the funds for repairs.

Accrington.—A sum of over £30 has been realised for the funds of the Oxford Street Church by a sale organised by the Women's League.

Belfast.—The Annual Meeting of the Belfast Domestic Mission was held in the Central Hall, Rosemary Street, on March 8, Mr. J. W. Kampster presiding over a large attendance. After hymn and prayer by the Rev. Eustace Thompson, the Committee's Report was read by the Secretary, Miss Charlotte Bruce. Sympathetic allusion was made to the losses sustained by the Mission through the death of Mr. John Rogers (Senior Trustee), Miss Carruthers, and Miss Drennan, all of whom had rendered devoted service. The more detailed report which the missionary, the Rev. Fred. Woolley, submitted to the meeting, emphasised the effect upon the Mission's institutions and activities of the present war. Fifteen young men had joined the colours, while the energies of the members remaining at home had been employed in making provision for the needs of the soldiers and sailors. The Treasurer, Mr. J. Mackenzie, showed that the finances were in a sound condition; and the Chairman, in proposing the adoption of the reports and statement of accounts, remarked that the subscribers had received full value for their money in the good work done so economically. After Mr. J. E. Barker had seconded the adoption of the reports, the Rev. E. S. Hicks, who had preached the Annual Sermons the previous day in the First Church and All Souls', spoke in cordial and encouraging terms of the past year's work. Mr. Eustace Gordon and the Rev. E. H. Pickering voiced the feelings of the audience in submitting a warm vote of thanks to Mr. and Mrs. Woolley. The Rev. G. J. Slipper proposed that thanks be given to the devoted voluntary workers, making special reference to Dr. Malcolm Brice Smyth, who, like his father and brother before him, freely placed his medical skill at the disposal of the Mission. Mr. Hugh Erskine, who had earlier submitted the report of the Provident Fund, seconded the resolution, and it was carried unanimously. With the exception of the blanks occasioned by death or removal, the members of the Committee of Management and of the Ladies' Committee were re-elected on the proposition of the Rev. J. A. Kelly, seconded by Mr. Harold Thomas. A vote of thanks to the Chairman, proposed by the Rev. H. J. Rossington, concluded the proceedings.

Dundee.—At a Public Meeting held under the auspices of the Free Religious Movement in Foresters' Hall on March 14 the question of the establishment of arbitration machinery to secure immunity from struggles such as that in which we are at present engaged was discussed. Mr. David Duncan presided, and the Minister, the Rev. Henry Dawtrey, delivered the address, concluding by moving a resolution to the effect that the leading clause in the instrument of peace should embody that in future all States should refer all their serious differences to an international tribunal.

Leeds.—At the Annual Meeting of the Leeds Charity Organisation Society, which was held on March 12, Mr. M. E. Sadler (Vice-Chancellor of the Leeds University) moved the election of the officers and members of the Council, and also the election of the Rev. Charles Hargrove as the Vice-President of the Society. In doing so he paid a tribute to the work accomplished by Mr. Hargrove, and said that whilst to all present he was a pattern of citizenship, to many he was a dear personal friend. The resolution was adopted.

London: Mansford Street Mission.—The Annual Meeting of Subscribers and Friends of the Mission was held at Lindsey Hall on Monday, March 15, the chair being taken by Mr. J. F. L. Brunner, M.P., President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. The Committee's Report and Financial Statement were presented by Mr. A. H. Punnett. The former records with much regret the death of the following supporters of the Mission: Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence, President in 1896, Mr. Hugh Martineau, Mrs. Hind, and Miss Reid. The principal event of the year had been the opening of Mansford House, Birchington—the generous gift of Mr. R. P. Jones, who was most cordially thanked—and the transference there of the convalescent and holiday work of the Mission from its temporary home in Apple Bay Road. From Whitsuntide till October eighty-two visitors stayed at Mansford House, thirty-four of them remaining for a second week; but since then it has been occupied by wounded soldiers, chiefly Belgians, the offer of the Home for hospital purposes having been made to the Red Cross Society at the beginning of the war. Accommodation was provided for twenty-five men, and the average number of patients at a time has been about twenty. All the arrangements are excellent, and have won high official praise. The state of the Mission finances still occasions much anxiety. There has again been a heavy loss in subscriptions, and the deficit amounts to £199 13s. 5d., though this sum has been partly reduced by £100, part of the legacy of £500 left by the late Mr. Stanton Preston. The detailed reports of the various institutions and guilds show that there has been no slackening whatever in the devoted efforts of the workers, upon whom the war has, of course, thrown additional burdens. The distress in the neighbourhood arising from unemployment, &c., has, however, not been as great as was anticipated. It is felt that the real time of difficulty will come at the close of the war, when the task of industrial readjustment has to be faced. The Rev. Gordon Cooper, in the course of his report, expressed his complete confidence in the work of the Mission, though he urged that its scope could be widened, and the influence of the Men's Club in particular greatly extended, if there were two missionaries, or three, instead of one. In moving the adoption of the Reports, Mr. Brunner congratulated the Committee on the record of the past year and the united spirit of the workers. The harder they fought to mitigate sorrow and relieve distress, he said, the better they were fulfilling their national duty and the dictates of true patriotism. The Rev. J. H. Weatherall seconded the adoption of the Reports, and made an urgent plea for a fuller recognition of the essential principle which underlay the Domestic Mission Movement. The great tragedy of the Reformation was that the Church, as a whole, lost for a time the sympathies and affections of the poor which the Catholic Church has always retained. It ceased to be the home of pity and of love, and, cursed with intellectualism, did not touch the lives of the struggling. It was the renewal of the spirit of love and sympathy which inspired the Evangelical revival of the eighteenth century, issued later in the desire for the liberation of the slaves, and more recently had found expression in the High Church Movement, with its profound and moving compassion for the sufferings of the poor. The foundation of the Domestic Missions was in line with these movements, and formed the brightest page in the history of their religious fellowship. These Missions had done splendid work, and their opportunity was great at the present time, when people were discarding the superstition that our social problems were all going to be permanently solved by legislation. It was only through that sense of fraternity which the Church was able to create that there was any hope of redemption for the human race. A resolution expressing thanks to the retiring Committee and proposing the election of the new Committee was moved by Mr. Worthington. The Rev. H. Gow proposed a vote of thanks to the Rev. Gordon Cooper for the enthusiasm and sympathy with which he led his band of workers. The proceedings concluded with a vote of thanks to Mr. Brunner, proposed by Mr. Ronald P. Jones, seconded by Mr. Punnett.

The Sunday School Anniversary Services were held on Sunday, March 14. Mr. T. M. Chalmers, the Secretary of the Sunday School Association, conducted the afternoon service, and also opened the subsequent Conference. In the evening the Rev. F. K. Freeston was the preacher. The afternoon collection, amounting to over six guineas, was given to the Sunday School Association Motor Ambulance Fund.

Newcastle. — On Thursday evening, March 11, a deputation from the Church of the Divine Unity, Newcastle-on-Tyne, waited upon Alderman Sir Joseph Baxter

Ellis, J.P., to present him with an address congratulating him upon having on that day completed fifty years' connection with his firm of John Hindhaugh & Co., during the whole of which time he had been connected with the Church. The Rev. Alfred Hall introduced the business, and asked the Secretary to read the address, after which Mr. O. Levin, J.P., presented it. Sir Joseph in an interesting speech expressed great appreciation of the gift and the kind wishes it conveyed.

Rochdale. — On Saturday, March 13, the Annual Meeting of the Rochdale Fellowship of Unitarian Churches was held at Oldham. Established six years ago, the Fellowship includes the churches at Oldham, Rochdale, Middleton, Heywood, and Todmorden. There was a large gathering, and after tea the President, Mr. Nurse, of Rochdale, took the chair, and gave an address on the work of the past year. Mr. J. Partington, on the nomination of the Oldham congregation, was elected President for the ensuing year.

Stourbridge. — The Annual Meeting of the Congregation of the Stourbridge Presbyterian (Unitarian) Church was held on Thursday, February 9. In spite of the war, the financial statement, which last year gave rise to anxiety, showed a considerable improvement, a deficit of £120 having been reduced to about £20. A weekly contribution of about £1 10s. is being made to the local Belgian Refugees' Fund. Sixteen men connected with the Church and Sunday School are serving with the colours. The women of the congregation are also doing their share of work for the country, more than 300 garments having been made in response to various war appeals. Attention is now being concentrated on Belgian soldiers interned in Holland, for which purpose a grant of £5 has been made for material by the local Belgian Fund. At a meeting of the Women's Society on March 3 a special address was given by the minister, the Rev. John Ewart, on 'The Duty of Women in War Time.' It was followed by a useful discussion.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

A FRIEND OF THE LEPERS.

In January, 1913, when Sir George Turner's name appeared in the list of New Year Honours, The Times published an appreciation of the work of this remarkable man, whom the writer justly named "Another Father Damien." The services which Sir George Turner has rendered to humanity since his retirement from the position of Medical Officer of Health in Cape Colony in 1895 at the age of 50 have been numerous and valuable, but perhaps the noblest work of his life was done in the leper asylum at Pretoria, where he prosecuted a tireless research into the nature of leprosy for several years, giving up all his spare time to the task of alleviating the sad lot of the fifty Dutch and forty native patients among whom he lived. He saw the lepers early in the morning, and again when he came home in the evening. Saturday and Sunday were entirely given to them. He was regarded with passionate devotion by all the inmates of the asylum, especially the children, who used to follow him about the settlement in a crowd. The saddest feature of these institutions is afforded by the leper children born of leper parents, for in every case several members of a leper family are admitted together.

After several years' work in this country (during which he pursued his studies of leprosy with unremitting zeal) Dr. Turner discovered that he had himself contracted the disease, and since then he has lived in retirement at Colyton, Devon, where his death occurred last Sunday.

THE PROTECTION OF OUR BIRDS.

The Royal Society for the Protection of Birds has, with great foresight, prepared a handbill, briefly setting forth our close-time law in French, Flemish, and English, for the benefit of Belgians who have made their home temporarily in England, especially in country places. A certain amount of snaring of small birds for the pot has been more customary in parts of Belgium than is approved or legalised in England, and it is as well that our visitors should be made acquainted with the Bird Protection Laws of Great Britain, so that they may not infringe them through ignorance. Any assistance in circulating these handbills will be welcome. Copies can be had on application to the Secretary of the Society, 23, Queen Anne's Gate, S.W.

SOCIETY FOR THE ABOLITION OF VIVISECTION.

The Society offers to send a Popular Speaker free of charge to Literary Societies, League Meetings, &c. With regard to the Lecturer, the Secretary of a large Brotherhood said: "Mr. Reed did us very good service, and the men were delighted with his earnestness and ability."

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.

WE have had good news of our work for the Belgian Hospitals this week. Looking back over the period of three months during which he has been acquainted with them, the friend who has acted for us said the other day: "There is a great change for the better in their appearance and equipment since December, and a good share of it is due to the help of our Fund." Another large consignment has been distributed, and fresh lists of necessities to be sent out before Easter have reached us. Care is taken to prevent overlapping. The Belgian authorities on the spot are fully aware of what we are doing and make suggestions from time to time, which help the effectiveness of our work. They continue to express not only their warm gratitude, but also their surprise at the promptness with which everything is carried out. The beautiful human side of it all is illustrated by the letters of thanks addressed to Mrs. Allen, and through her to our readers, which appear in another column.

NOTHING in the news of this week is more welcome than a sentence in an interview with Sir John French, which has been circulated by the Press Association. Since it has passed the Censor, we suppose it may be accepted as authentic, at least in general intention. "I do not believe," he said, "in a protracted war." But the words must not be misunderstood. They do not mean that our worst difficulties are over. It is only by concentrated and overwhelming effort that the war, with its terrible toll of human misery, can be shortened by even a few weeks. And we must be prepared to keep the effort going without a moment's relaxation, as long as it is needed. The belief of the most trusted general will not really shorten the war by a single day. We hope and pray that it may be over in a few months, but we know quite well that it may go on into next year. Our duty is not to waste time in speculation, but to keep stern resolution at the sticking point, and to be ready to surrender everything to the supreme demand.

SIR EDWARD GREY made an important speech on Monday, marked by the quiet reserve of strength and the clear moral judgment, which have won for him the confidence of his countrymen. It is well both for ourselves and for the whole of Europe, that the plain issue with which we are faced, should be stated and reiterated from time to time by a statesman of the first rank. "Do not let us lose sight," he said, "even for a moment, of the character and origin of this war, and of the main issue for which we are fighting." Germany, he insisted, could have had peace had she desired it. It was not a war due to misunderstandings. "We know that the German Government prepared for war as only people who plan can prepare, and this is the fourth time within living memory, that Prussia has made war in Europe."

SIR EDWARD GREY reminded his hearers that Germany has had very recent experience of the value of joint discussion between the European Powers, and of our capacity of entering upon such discussion with a single eye to the well-being of Europe.

It would have been far easier [he said] to have settled by a conference, the dispute between Austria-Hungary and Serbia, which Germany made the occasion for this war, than it was to get successfully through the Balkan crisis of two years ago. Germany knew from her experience of the Conference in London which settled the Balkan crisis that she could count upon our goodwill, our goodwill for peace, in any concert or conference of the Powers. We had sought no diplomatic triumph in the Balkan Conference. We had not given ourselves to any intrigue. We had pursued impartially and honourably the end of peace. We were ready last July to do the same again. In recent years we had given Germany every assurance that no aggression upon her would receive any support from us. We had withheld from her but one thing—we had withheld our unconditional promise to stand aside however aggressive Germany might be to her neighbours.

THE other great speech of the week, was made by Sir John Simon in Manchester on Tuesday. It was significant, chiefly for the practical rebuke which he administered to the impractical idealism, which imagines that the time has come for constructing schemes of peace.

Let us make no mistake [he said] the situation as it exists at this time, is not a situation that can be usefully dealt with by speculating in abstract terms as to what would be the pleasantest way in which the war could be ended. Our business is to end it, and to end it in the only way in which it can be ended by remembering how we got into it, by urging that as the overwhelming reason for a united national determination to carry it through, and by preserving that same memory when the happy time comes in which we may usefully and fruitfully discuss what are to be conditions of victorious peace.

There is here no touch of political chauvinism or military excess. The object is not to crush Germany but to win security for freedom and public law in Europe. "When this war is over," he reminded his hearers, "there will still be the British people, great and powerful and energetic, and there will still be the German people, great and powerful and energetic—you are not going to alter fundamental facts like those. The real issue is not that; the real issue is between two ideals."

It is difficult to keep the imagination alert over the whole military area. The portion which lies nearest to us, where our own men are engaged, absorbs our attention, and seems almost to exhaust our sympathies. Even the news of the fall of Przemyśl, one of the most spectacular events of the war, hardly caused more than a flutter of excitement. But we cannot be deaf to the appeal of human anguish, and Serbia has a special claim upon our help. In a letter which he has sent to the press, Sir Thomas Lipton describes the terrible epidemic of typhus which has broken out in Nish and the surrounding country.

Nish, with a normal population of 15,000 to 20,000, is now packed with over 100,000. In that overcrowded town there are many thousands of typhus cases; on one day in Nish nearly 300 people died of typhus, and the cemeteries were unable to receive the dead. Typhus carts, drawn by oxen, rumble through the streets, bearing as their burden, men raving in fever and delirium. On the street pavements I saw white-faced men sitting down and shivering in the first grip of the disease, unable to drag themselves to shelter. I visited the hospitals from north to south, and everywhere I found them full of typhus cases. In some hospitals they had neither blankets nor mattresses: in others the mattresses were put sideways, and three or four patients were lying on one mattress. Dr. Ryan, the chief of the American Red Cross Mission in Serbia, who has 2,900 patients under his care, told me that unless something is done immediately to stop the disease, more than half the population of Serbia will be wiped out.

CLEARLY the need is so colossal and so urgent that private charity can hardly attempt to deal with it. We should like to see a Government grant for hospital work and the equipment of a sanitary commission. There are brave men and women who will be eager to go, if only the means are placed at their disposal. Meanwhile, the British Red Cross are willing to extend their operations in Serbia if the necessary funds can be obtained, so that their work may not be hampered in other directions. Contributions for this special purpose should be sent to Lord Rothschild at 83, Pall Mall, London, S.W., earmarked "For Serbia."

THE Government scheme for organising the resources of the country, has made good progress, not the least remarkable thing about it being the quietness and good sense with which it has been accepted. In place of a competitive scramble for profits and wages, the one consideration is to be the welfare of the State. In itself, this appears to be so reasonable that it is impossible to stifle all speculation upon the way in which it will react upon our industrial arrangements, when the war is over. For the moment, however, questions of that kind are purely academic, and it would be most unfair to hail it as a triumph of socialism over individualism. Whatever our own economic creed may be, we can all agree to regard it as a most instructive experiment, which has been forced upon us by circumstances that are entirely abnormal.

FOR the moment, the question of the more adequate control of the Drink Traffic seems to be hanging fire. We hope that it does not mean that the interests are being mobilised and placing political obstacles in the way of a drastic national measure, which alone can be effective. Probably there is no trade in the country which finds it harder to be patriotic. On the one hand it has a position of special privilege, which it is most unwilling to surrender; on the other it is well organised to resist the pleas of the temperance reformer, which it always regards as fanatical and absurd. Meanwhile we are glad to see that so able a representative of working class opinion as Mr. J. H. Thomas, M.P., has urged the railwaymen to take the matter into their own hands by the adoption of a policy of voluntary abstinence. What was of far greater effect and moment, he said at Leamington on Sunday, than all questions of legislation in this connection should be the determination of the people themselves to say, "What to me is a luxury in normal times has to-day become a national evil." Their personal considerations must always be subordinated to the national good.

In a letter to the Rev. Evan Jones of Carnarvon, like himself a supporter of disestablishment, Mr. Lloyd George has made a vigorous defence of the policy of the Suspensory Bill. After brushing aside the speeches of irresponsible and extreme men as irrelevant, he affirms without hesitation that "to refuse to assent to this settlement at this moment or to enter into it in a grudging and querulous spirit, would be a blunder."

I wonder [he continues], whether the urgent need for union in this terrible hour is even now fully appreciated by the nation. Will nothing but disaster teach us not to manufacture quarrels over matters of secondary concern, whilst the fate of European freedom is being settled on the battlefield on which thousands of Welshmen have already fallen, and many thousands more are now facing death? It is my sincere hope, in the highest interests of Wales, that the leaders of Welsh opinion shall not prove themselves to be very small men in a very big situation. Wales would suffer more from such an exhibition than from a dozen bills such as the Postponement Bill. I mean to save Wales from that reproach if I can.

THE flood of pamphlets and small popular books, which crowd the bookstalls just now, is certainly bewildering and, to many people, not a little wearisome. It is hardly a case in which in the multitude of counsellors there is wisdom. Most of the discussions about Germany, from one point of view or the other, may be neglected without loss. There is nothing new to be said; the moment for an impartial valuation has not come; and many of us are rather tired of the contrasts between ourselves and the Germans, in which some writers seem to find an endless source for vague moralisings. Even placid and well-mannered exhortations against hatred are seldom the best incentive to charity. What we need to do chiefly, in view of the future, is to gain some accurate information about the history and achievements and national genius of our Allies. The admirable volume on Belgium which Mr. R. C. K. Ensor has contributed to the "Home University Library" (London, Williams & Norgate, 1s. net), is worth a whole stack of war pamphlets. No one can read it without glowing admiration of the spirit of a people who have refused so often to be conquered; and this kind of admiration, firmly based upon historical facts, is just what we need to teach us patience and good-temper in the strain and difficulty of the present situation.

* * *

ANOTHER small book of great value, brilliantly written and masterly in its survey of a vast and unfamiliar field, is 'Russia's Gift to the World,' by Mr. J. W. Mackail (London, Hodder & Stoughton, 2d. net). Russia, as Mr. Mackail says, is, for the mass of people in England, an unknown country; and the ignorance of which we are not ashamed is the mother of prejudice. "Those who know something of Russia know that the popular view is entirely wrong. And like all great errors about the facts of life, it is actively mischievous. We shall never be in good and useful relations with any nation, or with any body of our fellow-men until we take some pains to understand them and to know what they really are, what they think, what they create, what they seek to attain."

THE SORROW OF THE WORLD.

WE shall keep the days which are dedicated to the memory of the Passion and death of Christ with more solemnity than usual this year. We are more conscious of our need of their message. Fellowship with the sufferings of Christ seems no longer remote and unattainable, something reserved for the saints, but happily beyond the reach of ordinary men. The whole creation is groaning and travailing in pain. Death has entered our homes. We have been baptized into the sacred fellowship of sorrow. It does not seem strange that at the heart of our religion there should be a cross, the marred visage, and the crown of thorns.

It is this sombre note of tragedy in our own experience which has baffled and perplexed many people. They tell us that it is a time of special difficulty for religion. It seems to them easier to deny God than to affirm their faith in Him with any confidence. They even express the vague hope that when the war is over and the days of peace and ordered happiness return, it may be possible for us to recover our belief. Now it is certainly true that many of the pleasant day-dreams of the past lie shattered in the dust, but our faith in God and Christ ought not to be one of them. If religion has for us no light in the darkness, no healing and consolation for our bitter pain; if it is equal to the mystery of a death-bed in a comfortable home, but breaks down when the young and the brave die battling for their country, it does not mean that God has left us to ourselves, but that our thought of Him is poor and unworthy. There has been much in the religious life of the modern world which has obscured the essential element of tragedy in Christian experience. Sometimes it has been sensuous and sentimental, with little reference to human suffering and sin. Elsewhere it has thrown its energies into practical philanthropy supported by a vague belief in the benevolence of God. Men have fancied that a doctrine of divine good nature can give them all they need. In their eagerness to create a terrestrial paradise they have forgotten the life everlasting and the tribulation by which its beatitude is won.

And now the time has come for deep searching of heart and a great awakening. It is hard indeed for many shallow convictions to survive. We are startled to find how much more we have accepted than we have ever put to the test. The words of Scripture, its warnings, its judgments, its unearthly valuation of life, begin to penetrate deeper into the heart. The great books of Christian experience and consolation, so long neglected or despised, speak again with a living voice. We are discovering daily the tragic intensity of life, and, if we have faith and vision, behind the tragedy the immortal love of God.

We have few more words to add, for it is not our purpose to defend a position or to present an argument, but simply to suggest a line of prayerful meditation. None of us can escape the sufferings of this present time. We must see to it that we suffer with nobility of mind. Our private griefs can be borne with such unselfish heroism that they will turn into a well-spring of charity and healing compassion. Our public sorrows and losses may purge and fortify our hearts and unite all classes of our people in bonds of intimate sympathy. As disciples of the Crucified we shall find in the thought of fellowship with his sufferings some sense of the redeeming virtue of our own. Once we asked that God should prove his goodness by making us happy in our own way. Now we know that He has kept some better thing for us. He lays upon us the sorrow of the world. He offers us the Cross.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

A DIALOGUE BETWEEN THE RESOLVED SOUL AND CREATED PLEASURE.

COURAGE, my soul! now learn to wield
The weight of thine immortal shield!
Close on thy head thy helmet bright!
Balance thy sword against the fight!
See where an army, strong as fair,
With silken banners spreads the air!
Now if thou be'st that thing divine,
In this day's combat, let it shine!

*And show that Nature wants an art
To conquer one resolved heart.*

PLEASURE.

Welcome, the Creation's guest,
Lord of Earth, and Heaven's Heir,
Lay aside that warlike crest,
And of Nature's banquet share!
Where the souls of fruits and flowers
Stand prepared to heighten yours!

SOUL.

I sup above: and cannot stay
To bait so long upon the way.

PLEASURE.

On these downy pillows lie!
Whose soft plumes will thither fly:
On these roses! strewed so plain,
Lest one leaf thy side should strain.

SOUL.

My gentler rest is on a thought;
Conscious of doing what I ought.

PLEASURE.

Hark, how Music then prepares
For thy stay these charming airs!
Which the posting winds recall,
And suspend the river's fall.

SOUL.

Had I but any time to lose,
On this I would it all dispose.
Cease, Tempter! None can chain a mind Whom this sweet chordage cannot bind.

CHORUS.

*Earth cannot show so brave a sight
As when a single soul does fence
The batteries of alluring sense;
And Heaven views it with delight.
Then persevere! for still new charges sound;
And if thou overcom'st, thou shalt be crowned!*

PLEASURE.

All that's costly, fair, and sweet
Which doth scatteringly shine Shall within one Beauty meet,
And she be only thine.

SOUL.

If things of sight such heavens be,
What heavens are those we cannot see?

PLEASURE.

Wheresoe'er thy foot shall go,
The minted gold shall lie;
Till thou purchase all below,
And want new worlds to buy!

SOUL.

Were't not a price, who'd value gold?
And that's worth nought that can be sold.

PLEASURE.

Wilt thou all the glory have,
That war or peace commend?
Half the world shall be thy slave,
The other half thy friend.

SOUL.

What friends ! if to myself untrue ?
What slaves ! unless I captive you ?

PLEASURE.

Thou shalt know each hidden cause,
And see the future time
Try what depth the centre draws,
And then to Heaven climb.

SOUL.

None thither mounts by the degree
Of Knowledge but Humility.

CHORUS.

*Triumphs ! Triumphs ! victorious soul !
The world has not one pleasure more.
The rest does lie beyond the pole,
And is thine everlasting store.*

MARVELL.

COLLECT FOR HOLY WEEK.

O LORD GOD, Who hast made the sacrifices of Thy faithful children mighty for good ; we would especially remember at this time the death of Jesus Christ on the cross. May we and all who take his name be so filled with his spirit, and so guided by his example as to be ready to deny ourselves for the good of others, and to say with him in every hour of suffering and trial, "Father, Thy will, not mine, be done."

AMEN.

OUR BELGIAN HOSPITAL FUND.

LETTERS OF THANKS.

I HAVE received a number of letters this week which I should like the contributors to our fund to see, as they show the spirit in which our gifts have been received.

"The doctors and stretcher-bearers for whom you have sent the 'pharmacies portatives' thank you very warmly for putting them in the position of being able to give their best help to the sick and wounded. We none of us know how to express our gratitude. During the moments of calm in the firing line, we gather the pieces of shells, &c., and I am trying to send them to you. The soldiers send you these things, which they have picked up expressly for you to show that they think with emotion, at the front, of the generous English, who have sent them medicaments and clothing." He goes on to ask for various anæsthetics and medicines for the chaplain of his battalion, "Who on many occasions has not hesitated to penetrate almost to the German lines to pick up the wounded. He spends the whole of his time among the men in the trenches, and is a physician of the body as well as of the soul."

(2) From a doctor in charge of a hospital established in what was formerly a crèche.

"The sick and wounded in my hospital have been greatly touched by your gracious generosity. Your different gifts will contribute to restore health, and to give comfort to our unhappy soldiers so far from their homes. The Belgian soldier, so proud to fight side by side with the valiant English soldier, will never forget the help and support of the great English nation. Thank you, for my sick and wounded."

(3) From the Little Sisters of the Poor, to whom besides medicaments and clothes, we sent beds for themselves.

"We are deeply touched by all the interest which you show for us, and we want at once to express our gratitude, but we cannot tell you all we feel for your delicate attentions for ourselves ; but we beg you, madame, to let us give these good beds to our brave soldiers, and then we will take back for our own use the straw palliasses to which we are accustomed, and with which we shall be much more comfortable than we were on the floor."

The gentleman who took out the stores and beds writes :—

"The gratitude of the Petites Sœurs was most embarrassing. They swarmed round me, and all said they would never be able to get up in time in the morning ; instead of half-past 4, they wouldn't get up until 5 ! They are going to pray for 'la grande Angleterre qui a si bon cœur.'"

(4) From the doctor of a hospital in a schoolroom.

"I have the honour to report to you that I have received the bandages, dressings, instruments, and medicaments, &c., which you have been so good as to send me for the use of this hospital. I beg you, madame, to receive this most respectful expression of my warm gratitude for the interest you take in our sick soldiers, and for the means which, with so much generosity, you have put at our disposition to restore them to health."

(5) From an English girl nursing in one of the Belgian hospitals.

"The members of the First Aid Yeomanry Corps wish me to tender their most grateful thanks to the readers of THE INQUIRER for their great kindness in sending medical stores and clothing to this hospital. The former have been of the greatest comfort to the patients ; some of the latter I took up to the trenches myself. The men's gratitude was boundless ; one man told me he had not had a new pair of socks for three months. You may like to hear a few details about our work. We came (six trained nurses and ten assistants) to — in October. The Belgian military Medical Service entrusted us with the nursing in this hospital in a school building, where we have six wards containing about 100 beds. We had a small convalescent home for about six weeks where sixteen patients recovering from typhoid were sent, but this had to be closed owing to lack of funds. The Belgian authorities provide the food for the patients, surgical and medical attendance, and male orderlies ; but we are responsible for the equipment of the hospital, medical comforts, and clothing that the patients need. We are in the position of Belgian Army sisters, there being no permanent female staff of nurses attached to the Belgian Army Medical Service. Under the direction of the Belgian officers we distribute clothing to the men in the trenches, who express great gratitude for the little that we can do for them. The general feeling among the Belgians out here is that the English say nothing, but they work, work, work, and for them nothing is impossible ! We wish to thank most heartily those readers of THE INQUIRER who have so nobly come to our aid."

(This hospital has since been damaged by a bomb, but, fortunately, no serious harm was done beyond a number of broken windows.) ROSE ALLEN.

BERNHARDI REDIVIVUS.

GENERAL BERNHARDI'S recent apology for Germany, republished in The Times from American newspapers, is a very striking indication of German stupidity. The irony of Germany's innocence being defended by such a man would be delicious if it were not so utterly absurd. If the German authorities had the least understanding of the mind of neutral nations, and the way to deal with them she would order Bernhardi to be silent. It is open to the Germans to say, as some of them have said, that Bernhardi's book does not in the least represent the real aims or temper of Germany. They might claim, as some of them have claimed, that Bernhardi is a mere individual, that he is comparatively unknown, that his book has no influence, and that the civilised world has ascribed to it an importance far beyond the facts.

They might say it is an obscure jingoistic utterance from a man of no authority : it is quite unfair to regard it as a representation of the inner mind of Germany. They might argue that England has ascribed for its own purposes an exaggerated importance to Bernhardi and Treitschke. Against such a repudiation of these men it would be difficult for us to bring irrefragable proof of our belief that they express the Prussian spirit and the Prussian aims. It may be that, in spite of them, Prussia was essentially lamblike and conciliatory and kindly affectioned towards other nations. We may have been doing her an injustice in regarding these men as her prophets. But when Bernhardi himself comes forward to defend the lamblike character of his own book, and to show that the Allies are wolves, we gasp with astonishment. We feel it is blindness with an element of insanity in it.

Bernhardi's book is before us. It was, at least, an honest, outspoken defence of militarism. It glorified war as an essential instrument of civilisation. It argued ably against the existence of any moral principles for nations. Its own welfare and its right to take whatever it can get is the ultimate law for every state. It urged Germany to be ready to strike for her own advantage at the first favourable moment. Russia must be chastened, France must be destroyed, England must be humiliated. Germany was called to world dominion, and that dominion could only be established by a great and splendid war. Nothing could be plainer than this teaching of Bernhardt's book. However much we abhor his principles, there was a certain intellectual sincerity in him which we could not but admire. It was disgusting, but it was at least honest.

And now this man dares to come forward and assert that England is the real cause of this war, and that Germany was most anxious to live in perfect peace with all her neighbours. He tells us of her deep, unfeigned respect for little nationalities, of her freedom from all aggressive aims, of her love for peace. He tells us that this war has been forced upon her against her will. This is not splendide mendax. It is nauseating.

As we read the stupid vituperation and the wild, angry expressions of German authors, we remember the words "Quos deus vult perdere prius dementat." They began with declaring that England had gained by trickery an Empire which she could not hold, that we were a nation of shopkeepers, that we were decadent and effete, hopelessly divided amongst ourselves, incapable of heroism. Now they charge us with being the tyrants of the world; we are the most aggressive, the most dangerous power the world has ever seen. We are strangling all civilised nations. Our hydra heads must be cut off. We are a Colossus which rules the world, interfering with the legitimate liberties of all. No one is safe from our insatiable lust for power. Germany has undertaken a holy war in order to free the world from our tyranny. We know, of course, that the charge is made as the result of an indignant surprise at our having prevented Germany from carrying out her plans for the destruction of France. But when Bernhardt says such things we feel there is madness in the air.

All nations tend to pervert facts for their own advantage in times of war; but for their own safety, and in order to influence neutrals, they must keep within the limits of sanity. Bernhardt's defence shows that under the obsession of lust for world dominion, and its bitter disappointment at the frustration of carelessly laid plans, the Prussian mind has become unhinged. Not merely does it not see things exactly as they are—very few, even in calm moments, can do that—but it sees things essentially as they are not; it has lost its reason. Glaring contradictions in its arguments are no longer felt. The absolute inconsistency between Bernhardt's book and his apologies for Germany is typical of the Prussian mind at the present time. Such insanity is not incompatible with much cleverness, much courage, much stubborn resistance. I do not even know that it is incompatible with victory. But it alienates such a nation from the sympathies of the civilised world.

Bernhardt's book made us all realise the danger to the world of Prussian militarism. It was a strong, rational, terrible theory which was a constant threat to peace. But Bernhardt's Apologia is worse. It is the revelation of a mental attitude maddened by anger and disappointment more ruthless and more deadly, because more divorced from reason. We cannot argue with such delusions. Some day we may hope that the great German democracy may awake and fling away its delusions, and drive out those who have imbued it with this poison of insanity. Meanwhile, it is by deeds not words that truth and justice can alone be defended. With infinite sorrow, but with ever increasing confidence, we have to go on with this hideous warfare until the sanity of Germany is restored.

UNITED ACTION.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—I have read with much interest your inspiring article in the INQUIRER, entitled "The Young Men." The time, as you rightly say, for debate has long passed. I am glad that you have emphasised this in your admirable article on "Liberty of Discussion" in "last week's issue. It is fatuous, and may do much harm, to raise, at this juncture, academic discussions as to whether it would have been wiser to have avoided this titanic struggle, and to have accepted, if necessary, Prussian military domination. It becomes clearer every day to all but a very insignificant minority, that we had no option but to take our share in this struggle,—a struggle forced upon Europe by a power that aimed at world domination, which, if secured, was to be upheld by military authority. If in this case our interests have synchronised with our duty, that does not make our duty any the less clear, nor does it detract from the nobility of the sacrifices which are being daily recorded, and which, while filling us with pride, are certainly making us a sorrowing nation.

Never, does it seem to me, was the path of Britain clearer; never has the necessity for united action been more imperative; never have the issues been more stupendous. We are upholding the rudimentary rights of nations, small as well as great; the sacred inviolability of treaties, without which sanction all international progress is impossible; and we are now called upon to rid the world for ever of a military despotism which preaches that every kind of horror and cruelty and barbarism is allowable, nay imperative, in the prosecution of war. Surely these are issues which all our young men who have flocked so willingly to the colours may be justly proud to support. Surely we, too, may be proud to let them go, even if our hearts are heavy and our eyes are dim. Surely we do not ask for more than is fitting and right when we plead that there may be no discordant note, no hesitating voice, and no reluctance to bear all that may be necessary to achieve the final victory.—Yours, &c.

BRITISH RED CROSS SOCIETY.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—It will be remembered that in response to an earnest request from the British Red Cross Society, an Appeal was issued in December last to all Unitarian and Free Christian Congregations whose names appear in the Essex Hall Year Book, inviting them to make a Collection on the first Sunday in January. Lord Rothschild, on behalf of the Headquarter Collection Committee, desires to thank those who responded so generously to the Appeal. Something like 15,000 Congregations belonging to all denominations contributed the large sum of £78,500; and it is gratifying to know that our Congregations were not backward in responding. A number of Congregations for various reasons were unable to make a Collection in January; and to them an earnest appeal is now made by the Red Cross Society to take part in this benevolent work. To show how urgent is the need, it is only necessary to state that the expenses of the work at home and on the Continent amount to nearly £2,000 a day. Cheques should be made payable to Lord Rothschild, and forwarded to the British Red Cross Society (Room 99), 83, Pall Mall, London, S.W.—Yours, &c.

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

SOCRATES.

Socrates, the Man and his Mission. By R. Nicol Cross, M.A. London: Methuen & Co., 5s. net.

ONE of the minor miseries of the war must be felt acutely by authors, who after long labour find themselves at the moment of publication face to face with a world which has almost ceased to read. Mr. Nicol Cross is in this evil case with his "Socrates," and an acute feeling of sympathy almost disarms the critic. We shall not, however, pay him and his book the poor tribute of undiscerning praise, for it is his first essay in authorship, and the book itself is far too good for trivial compliment. It is the product of long and conscientious labour, and it has the good fortune to fill a gap. Socrates is familiar enough in histories of Greek philosophy, and much has been written about him in introductions to the Platonic Dialogues or Xenophon's Memorabilia; but we know of no similar attempt to present him in a full-length portrait, as a man among men, with the careful elaboration of personal detail, which enables the ordinary reader to feel the human reality behind the mythical teacher of virtue. It may, indeed, be doubted whether Socrates is likely to make a strong appeal to the religious affections of the modern world. He was, in a sense, too lonely and self-sufficient, with too little of the unearthly grace of Christian saintliness, to touch the deepest springs of religious loyalty. It was never said of him that the common people heard him gladly, or that tired and sinful souls found in him the rest of the love of God. But he had in large measure the lower and less appealing grace of moral vision and of fortitude unspoiled by his own mental subtlety, which gave him at last the martyr's crown. He remains for all time the highest expression of what Greek philosophy can do for the human soul, but no one has ever woven a doctrine of redemption round his death. Mr. Cross has expressed exactly what we mean, the strength and also the limitations of his influence, in the following passage about his religion: "His position was the result of that solid common sense and quiet sanity which characterised all his relations (secular and sacred), and which were the embodiment and expression of the faculty of reason, constructed and enriched by wide reading, large experience, and assiduous thought upon the many problems of human conduct."

Mr. Cross would have consulted the interests of the general reader to better purpose if he had pruned some of his excursions into technical scholarship or relegated them to an appendix. In many places he has distilled the finer essence of his subject and made it contribute to an essay in portraiture; but elsewhere we are plunged into the arguments and rivalries of different schools of interpretation, which have little meaning except for scholars of special training. The style in which the book is written also seems to us to need the discipline of reticence and simplicity. Its pages bristle with too many allusions to the fashionable authors of the moment. It is just because Socrates is not modern, but timeless, that he retains his human value and his power of appeal. To compare him with Mr. Bernard Shaw, almost as though it were a compliment to Socrates, is to surround him with an atmosphere of restlessness and false emphasis, from which it is not the least merit of the classical figures of the past that they have extricated themselves, and finally escaped. But these are merely the natural blemishes of a first book. If we venture to point them out it is because, taken as a whole, in the solidity of its workmanship and the breadth of its human interests, this volume on Socrates is full of happy augury for the author's literary future.

ENGLISH LITERATURE IN THE REVOLUTIONARY PERIOD.

The Cambridge History of English Literature, Vol. XI. Cambridge, at the University Press, 9s. net.

"BLISS was it in that dawn to be alive, but to be young was very heaven," wrote Wordsworth when, in 1814, he reviewed the recent story of France and the outcome of Revolution. But in that dawn he was too immature to give worthy utterance to what he felt, though, as he says himself, "led to take an eager part before my time." And Wordsworth, born in 1770, was the eldest of the poets of this period. The inspiration of what might, perhaps, be called the greatest event of the world's history, came to a later generation, babes or yet unborn when the first outbreak occurred, but from early manhood initiated in the great ideas to which it gave birth. So this volume of the Cambridge History, despite its title, seems to us a very quiet one. Burke and Bentham are not names associated with the advocacy of revolution. Cowper and Crabbe, Wordsworth, Coleridge, and Southey, we think of as advocates of quiet thoughtfulness and gentle orthodoxy. Burns, conscious of his mental superiority to patrons so far above him in society, was a strenuous Radical; but it is not the French, but the sturdy Scotch spirit of independence which inspires his song. Blake is, indeed, a heretic and revolutionary, and the 'Book of Urizen' (1797), reminds us of the famous Nietzsche.

Perhaps among all the excellent articles of this volume, what will best repay reading are the essay on Wordsworth by the French Professor of English Literature at the Sorbonne, which adds to all that has been written by English admirers a sketch "from the European point of view," and albeit it would have provoked the poet's "surprise and resentment" is well worthy of consideration; and, with this, Mrs. Aldis' delightfully written article on 'The Bluestockings,' the first Englishwomen who, not merely as individuals, but as a society or coterie, made a practical and successful protest against what Swift wrote of as "the pernicious error prevailing among men that it is the duty of women to be fools in everything except what is merely domestic."

MR. DICEY has issued a revised and enlarged edition of his 'Introduction to the Study of the Law of the Constitution' (London: Macmillan & Co., 10s. 6d. net), at an opportune moment. We can imagine no more salutary discipline for political speculators, with their tendency to fall into the snare of vague and ambitious phrases, than the careful study under a competent guide of the problems of Government and the slow growth of a democratic constitution. Such an opportunity is provided by Lord Bryce's 'Studies in History and Jurisprudence' or the volume before us. The special feature of this new edition is the long Introduction dealing with the changes and the new ideas, which have modified the working of the constitution during the last thirty years. Among other topics it discusses Woman Suffrage, Proportional Representation, Federalism, and the Referendum. Mr. Dicey's highly critical attitude towards many of our popular political specifics may provoke the reader to strong dissent. In any case, it will save him from the dullness of easy agreement.

'THE POEMS OF EMILE VERHAEREN,' translated by Alma Strettell, has just been issued by Mr. John Lane. The volume contains a Biographical Introduction by the translator, and a portrait of the author specially drawn for this edition by John S. Sargent, R.A. All profits will be devoted to the Belgian Field Hospital. The price of the book is 3s. 6d. net.

THE STORY OF DANTE.

II.—POET, PATRIOT, AND EXILE.

THE poet Dante had many friends amongst the poets, painters, and musicians of Florence. He and the poets talked of poetry and wrote poems to one another. One of his friends, who was a musician, set some of Dante's verses to music, and would sing them to him. Another painted later a portrait of him in a group on the wall of a new palace-chapel in Florence.

This building was afterwards used as a prison, and for many centuries the walls of the chapel were covered with whitewash. At last, about sixty years ago, a party of English and Americans in quest of the supposed Dante portrait, succeeded in getting the whitewash removed. There they found, as they expected, the precious picture of Dante, still fresh and beautiful in line and colour—uninjured, except that the eye was spoilt by the workman's tool.

Imagine the interest of that discovery! Portraits were known of Dante in later life. But here, behind the whitewash, was the youthful poet who had loved Beatrice, had wept at her death, and had written 'The New Life.'

Towards the end of 'The New Life' he tells us that once he (the poet) tried, like his artist friends, to draw the picture in his mind. On a certain day, just a year after his gentle lady had been made a citizen of eternal life, Dante was thinking of her as he sat alone. And thus remembering her he betook himself "to draw the resemblance of an angel." He then went on to draw more "figures of angels." Dante's thoughts seem to have been very often like pictures. He remembered as in pictures, and could make word-pictures for others to see.

Some day as a poet—an artist in words—Dante would be able to make real for others his vision of Beatrice amongst the saints and angels of Heaven—as one "of the citizens of eternal life." But he had other work to do first. He himself was a citizen. He loved his native city and was ready to take his share in public life. It was for him to work for the welfare of Florence, and, if need be, to suffer for her.

Dante served in the Florentine army, in one battle "fighting valiantly on horseback in the front rank." He served his city, too, in ways of peace, but not for long, because those were unsettled times. One Italian city was often at war with another. In Florence, also, different parties in the management of public affairs would resort in the conflict to violence and even to war. There was often actual fighting in the streets between different factions, and the leaders of the defeated party would be sent into exile.

In our days we try more and more to manage our city affairs without quarrelling or violence. In our school games we learn to play fairly and to carry on our contests without malice. We try to strive, one side against the other, with goodwill to our comrades and goodwill to our opponents. In public life, too, we try to keep to the rules of the game.

In Dante's time there was still fierce conflict in Florence and fierce resentment for defeat. He himself was bitterly angry with the leaders who kept the city in a constant state of turmoil, caring more for the triumph of their own side than for the good of the people. All through his life he held fast to the ideal of a government based on justice and obeyed in peace. He kept on hoping that better times were coming for Italy, but again and again he was disappointed. All through his life, like Garibaldi, Dante mourned for the dark days, still keeping the fire of hope burning in his heart. But he mourned and hoped alone. He might have worn on his breast, as a badge, the black flag of Garibaldi and his followers, but he would have found few, in his time, to understand its meaning.

Dante's side in the government was defeated, and he was banished from Florence, never to return, on pain of death. His family, it seems, remained in Florence. We know nothing of his home except the names of his wife and four children, two sons and two daughters. His younger daughter bore the name of Beatrice, "the gentle lady" of Dante's poems.

He did not settle down in any other place, but spent the rest of his life as a lonely exile, thinking of his native city and longing to return. We know that he carried with him into exile vivid memories of his native city. He remembered the beautiful cathedral—once a temple of Mars—with its pavement of black and white marble; its dome, added in Christian times, and the stone font in which every Florentine baby was baptised. We know that Dante remembered the hills about Florence, the River Arno, with its bridges, wharves, and boats. He remembered, too, many stories from the book of Florentine history and legend. He could see as in a picture many a scene and many a figure from the past life and legend of his native city. It was as if the old badge of Florence, a white lily on a field of red, was pictured on Dante's heart, that he might never forget her.

And Dante still treasured in secret the wondrous vision of earlier days. But before he could worthily picture this vision for all later ages, he had far to travel and much to learn. L. H.

MANCHESTER DISTRICT ASSOCIATION OF PRESBYTERIAN AND UNITARIAN CHURCHES.

ANNUAL MEETINGS.

THE Twenty-Fourth Annual Meetings of this Association were held on Saturday, March 20. The attendance was well up to the average, and the proceedings were enthusiastic beyond what might have been expected in such times as the present. The usual afternoon service was held in Cross Street Chapel at 3.30. The Rev. W. Jellie, of Southport, conducted the service, and preached a strong and helpful sermon on the "Steadfastness of Faith." The organist and choir of Brookfield Church, Gorton, provided the musical part of the service. After tea, the Public Meeting was held in the Memorial Hall, the President, the Rev. J. Morley Mills, in the chair. The Report of the Governing Body and the Treasurer's balance sheet were adopted, and addresses were given by the President, Mr. J. F. L. Brunner, M.P., President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association; and Mr. Philip M. Oliver, Secretary of the Social Questions Committee of the Association and Liberal candidate for Knutsford. The President based his remarks on the contents of the Report, and appealed for perseverance with the good work in hand. "It may be fairly claimed," the Report said, "that 'the spirit of revival and enterprise,' referred to last year as 'felt by many, and generally admitted to be moving in most parts of the district,' has continued to operate, in spite of circumstances which might be regarded as difficult and adverse, arising from the war." The Report noted with appreciation the satisfactory continuance of the Midday Services held every Tuesday in Cross Street Chapel. It concluded with a cordial acknowledgment of the close fellowship which has been maintained between the Home Missionary College and the District Association, and its "particularly happy issue in the establishment of a most promising student ministry at Oldham Road."

The adoption of the Report and balance sheet was moved from the chair, and seconded by Mr. J. Wigley, who drew attention to the reformed Lay Preachers' Union, which, with the assistance of the Principal and Warden of the Home Missionary College already generously given, might be expected to become very serviceable.

Kindly criticism and valuable counsel were contributed by Mr. J. F. L. Brunner, M.P. His pointed challenge, "We are sure of our principles; are we so sure of our methods?" went home, as did his claim that "we can help" in the settlement of Peace terms, which would supply a more difficult task than the carrying on of the war. Mr. Philip M. Oliver made a spirited defence of the special series of Lenten Addresses which were being given in Cross Street Chapel at the Tuesday Midday Services. The Meeting closed with the usual votes of thanks.

WE understand that the Motor Ambulance Fund, for which the Sunday School Association appealed to the children and young people of our Churches and schools, has so far met with a satisfactory response. Letters with donations have been coming in from all parts of the country during the last few days. The final day for sending in contributions was Tuesday, March 23; but no doubt there are still a number of schools and churches which do not wish to be left out, and they should forward their donations as soon as possible.

 OWING to pressure on our space we are compelled to hold over some reports till next week.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Bath.—A Conversazione was held on March 17 under the auspices of the Social Committee of the Trim Street Congregation in aid of the S.S.A. Ambulance Fund. The Rev. A. Cunliffe Fox presided, and in a few words of thanks, referred to the great Christian work which was being done by the churches throughout the land for the alleviation of the sufferings of the men who were fighting the nation's battles. Just over £7 was raised.

Hastings.—At the Annual Meeting of the Free Christian Church held recently, encouraging reports were presented from the different branches of the work. Notwithstanding the many claims which have had to be met in connection with the war, the Treasurer (Mr. H. G. Proctor) was able to announce a substantial balance in hand. The Secretary of the Church Guild (Miss Viner) reported that the usual work had been on the whole well maintained, and that the Minister, the Rev. E. Lockett, had held weekly classes for the young people, and a Study Circle for members of the congregation, which had proved very helpful. Lectures had been given during the session by the Revs. W. H. Drummond, S. Burrows, and the Minister. The Treasurer (Mr. D. Pilcher) reported favourably of the Guild finances. The Ladies' Sewing Circle, of which Mrs. Measures is the Secretary, has done excellent work in making garments, &c., for the soldiers, in addition to its ordinary work. Here also Mrs. Mason (Treasurer) was able to report a balance on the right side. During the year the Church has lost one subscribing member by death, and three new members have joined. On Sunday, March 14, the Church was visited by the Rev. Dr. James Drummond, who preached at both services to large congregations; and on Thursday, the 18th, the Rev. Joseph Wood gave a lecture under the auspices of the Guild on 'Conversation and the Conversationalists,' which was much appreciated.

Hindley.—The Presbyterian Chapel held its Welcome Meeting to the Rev. R. F. Rattray on the 17th inst., when there was a large attendance, and the proceedings were of the most cordial character. The Chairman was Mr. I. Barrow, and the other speakers were the Revs. J. C. Odgers and S. A. Mellor, J. J. Wright, H. Fisher Short, W. T. Bushrod, Mr. Upright (Primitive Methodist Minister, Hindley); Dr. George Jessel, Mr. Ernest Blundell (Superintendent of the Sunday School), and others, Lampeter.—The Rev. R. C. Jones has tendered his resignation as pastor of Brondeifi church. He has been minister of the church from the opening in 1876—the only minister. He was instrumental in building it and having it paid for, and this twice, as the first building collapsed owing to some defect in the structure. Mr. Jones will have been forty-eight years in the ministry when he retires in July.

Malton.—The Bi-Centenary of the Unitarian Church, which was referred to at the services on Sunday, March 14, will be celebrated in the autumn, when the Yorkshire Unitarian Union is to hold its Annual Conference at Malton. The Church was erected in 1715. From the first it stood for liberal religious thought, but it did not become distinctly Unitarian in its teaching until after 1783, when the Rev. John Bartlett began his long pastorate. In 1784 the congregation carried out extensive improvements to the building, considerable help being given towards defraying the cost by Unitarians in York, Wakefield, Leeds, Bradford, Sheffield, and Manchester. After Mr. Bartlett's death there was a succession of ministers; but for the past ten years the church has been under the charge of Mr. T. Manning, of York, who has visited Malton, and taken the services on alternate Sundays. In recalling the splendid spirit of the men who had fought for freedom of worship in the past in his sermon on Sunday, March 14, Mr. Manning said they re-dedicated the chapel on that day as a temple of worship, praise, and gratitude to God, and re-consecrated themselves to the service of mankind in the spirit of their fathers.

Midland Christian Union.—The Annual Meeting of the Midland Christian Union of Presbyterian, Unitarian, and other non-subscribing Churches, was held on March 16 at the Temperance Hall, Birmingham, Mr. W. Byng Kenrick presiding. According to a Report which was presented by the Secretary (Mr. E. Ellis Townley), steady progress was being made in the formation of guilds. The grants made by the Union amounted to £381, as compared with £394 the previous year, and the incidental expenses were less. Proposing the adoption of the Report and statement of accounts, the President observed that, as English men and women, they could not be insensible to the great events that were going on in the world around them. Particularly in their religious denomination there were points to which they could not be insensible: in many of their social gatherings the common note was one of civil and religious liberty. There was not one of them, he imagined, who was not convinced that the powers which dominated Prussia, and through Prussia the great central States of Europe, were inimical to civil and religious liberty all over the world. Certainly the young men among them had not been in any doubt about that, and they had shown their determination to take their share in the work which confronted the nation as a whole. There were, however, special duties which naturally fell to those who were left comparatively unemployed so far as the direct issues were concerned, but who, nevertheless, had duties which they must carefully consider and perform. Not the least among those duties was that they should stimulate themselves and one another in holding fast to the essential things of religion in this time of difficulty. They were entering upon a period of strained endeavour and cheerful endurance. When the time came for some great national settlement let them be prepared, in the proper frame of mind, without hatred and without tolerance of what was wrong, to do their share in calling for a proper settlement. The Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, seconding, said one of the first effects of the war was that people began to crowd the churches. Now they had again settled down to the old indifference that was characteristic of the pre-war days. He could only describe that conduct as mean. It seemed people were prepared to use religion in a selfish manner. When they recovered from the first shock of war and felt somewhat secure they fell back to the old groove. The Report was adopted, and Mr. W. Byng Kenrick was re-elected president. The following were appointed on the Executive Committee:—Mr. W. Cheshire, Mr. J. P. P. Duffield, Miss E. R. Lee, Mr. Lewis Lloyd, Miss Nettlefold, Rev. J. E. Stronge, Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, and Rev. I. Wrigley. The Rev. Joseph Wood, Mr. W. Byng Kenrick, and Mr. E. Ellis Townley were elected delegates to the Southern Advisory Committee; Mr. Philip J. Worsley was reappointed hon. treasurer, and Mr. E. Ellis Townley, hon. secretary. After luncheon at the Imperial Hotel, a Conference was held at the Waverley Road Church, Small Heath. The subject for discussion was 'Mysticism,' the speakers being the Revs. W. Whitaker (Manchester), W. E. Ireland (Macclesfield), and J. M. Lloyd Thomas (Birmingham). A public service was held in the evening at the Waverley Road Church, the preacher being the Rev. Dr. J. Estlin Carpenter, Oxford.

Women's League.—The Committee of the League of Unitarian and other Liberal Christian Women arranged for a Special Service for Women, which was held on Tuesday, 16th inst., at 5 P.M. The use of Essex Church was kindly granted them, and about 100 women availed themselves of the opportunity offered for united prayer and praise. The Rev. J. H. Weatherall conducted the service, and gave an address from the words "The morning cometh." The quiet organ voluntaries contributed to the devotional atmosphere of the hour's worship.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

AN ENGLISH NURSE IN THE TRENCHES.

The following extract from a letter written by an English nurse, who is shortly to marry a Belgian officer, is taken from The Nursing Times:—"Yesterday I went up to the trenches with W—— and Mr. H. with the Mors. We went to our usual poste de secours, and met a very charming major, and he let us go up to the trenches; we went right along the line with the Lieutenant distributing cigarettes and woollies. We went to the Major's hut and had coffee there, and then the Lieutenant took me up to the first line, and I had a most exciting time as it was being bombarded, and the Lieutenant, after going in front to show me the way, suddenly ran back and told me not to come any further as there was a blesé there and the Germans were shelling the place. However, I insisted on going, and explained I was a nurse, and at last he let me, and I actually did first aid in the first line of the trenches! Shells fell quite near me, and unfortunately one man rolled dead at my feet and two others were badly wounded. I helped the doctor with them, and assisted them to the Major's hut, where we got stretchers for them and carried them to the poste de secours, where I dressed them properly, and then got permission to take them to Calais. I gave them hypodermic injections of morphia and strychnine; however, on the way one man collapsed so much we took him to A——, a small English hospital for the Belgians. All the officers I saw yesterday were so kind, and the doctors were keenly interested in the way I dressed the wounds, and stood and looked on, and let me give the injections and everything myself, and allowed me to bandage as I wanted to, and when finished said, 'Bien ça!' So I honestly think good work was done yesterday."

THE PROTECTION OF NATIVE RACES IN AUSTRALASIA AND POLYNESIA.

The third annual report of the Association for the Protection of Native Races in Australasia and Polynesia clearly shows that there was urgent need of a society of this kind in the Commonwealth when it came into being, and that in many directions it has been able to take useful action on behalf of the aborigines, preventing acts of aggression and checking notable abuses. The natives of Australia have claimed its first attention, but the sympathies of the Association has been extended to the groups of islands in the Pacific. In Papua, up to the present time, there has been no need for the Association to interfere, but it is recognised that, with the growth of commerce in that territory, there will develop a "labour problem," and also other cognate problems, which will call for much watchfulness if the desire to get wealth is not to supplant the desire to give justice to the natives. So far, it is gratifying to learn, the Federal Government has been guided solely by the desire to discharge its responsibilities in a spirit of fairness when dealing with the people whose land has come under their administration. The desire of the Association is that the aborigines shall all be brought under one single national control, irrespective of their location. This alone will develop a national sense of responsibility and establish equitable conditions for these people. It will be seen that the members conceive of their duties in the light of guardians of the rights of individuals, irrespective of colour, and, although they do not attempt to take part in the active amelioration of conditions which it is the province of Governments and missionary organisations to deal with, they seek to create a humane public sentiment and a sound conscience among the people of Australia, on the very important question of native administration in all its aspects.

BISMARCK ON POLITICAL AND MILITARY LEADERS.

Bismarck had a large measure of political wisdom which has been denied to his successors. How clearly he perceived the danger of military autocracy to the modern state is seen in the following passage, which we quote from 'Bismarck, the Man and the Statesman,' vol. ii. p. 102. He had "the conviction that even victorious wars cannot be justified unless they are forced upon one, and that one cannot see the cards of Providence far enough ahead to anticipate historical development according to one's own calculation. It is natural that in the staff of the army not only the younger active officers, but likewise experienced strategists, should feel the need of turning to account the efficiency of the troops led by them, and their capacity to lead, and of making them prominent in history. It would be a matter of regret if this effect of the military spirit did not exist in the army; the task of keeping its results within such limits as the nation's need of peace can justly claim is the duty of the political, not the military, heads of the state. That...even down to the most recent times, the staff and its leaders have allowed themselves to be led astray and to endanger peace lies in the very spirit of the institution, which I would not forego. It only becomes dangerous under a monarch whose policy lacks sense of proportion and power to resist one-sided and constitutionally unjustifiable influences."

BISMARCK'S IDEAL OF INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS.

The same book illustrates the radical difference between his view of German policy in relation to other countries and the truculent desire to dominate which has taken its place: "It has always been my ideal aim [he said], after we had established our unity within the possible limits, to win the confidence not only of the smaller European states, but also of the Great Powers, and to convince them that German policy will be just and peaceful, now that it has repaired the injuria temporum, the disintegration of the nation. In order to produce this confidence it is above everything necessary that we should be honourable, open, and easily reconciled in case of friction or untoward events."—Vol. ii. p. 290.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.

SEVERAL gifts have been sent to our Belgian Hospital Fund this week as Easter offerings. This fine motive adds a touch of religious devotion to our work. Next Thursday, April 8, will be the birthday of King Albert. Who will send us gifts in his honour? We are sure that no greeting of respect and admiration will touch him more deeply than help sent to his wounded soldiers.

THE Easter holidays will be shorn of their brightness. Indeed, for most sensible people they will almost cease to exist. Many who have worked hard during the past six months may need a few days of quiet recuperation in order that they may go on with renewed vigour; but they ought to make the period of resting as short as possible, for there is something for everybody to do. At a time when we are making the utmost demands upon labour we must beware lest any of us set an example of self-indulgence in pleasure or leisurely idleness. We are sorry chiefly that there will be no spring exodus for the mass of the toilers in the great cities. The cheap fares which take them for a day to the sea mean much to them. But the railways are firm in their refusal to give any holiday facilities, and they are right. They are needed for sterner work.

BUT this fat that most of us are to curb our wandering habits and stay at home may be to many people a blessing in disguise. We have become the victims of restlessness. A holiday has come to mean going somewhere, instead of leisure to enjoy our own surroundings. In every home, however poor and confined it may be, there are opportunities of happiness, treasures of memory and rest and human fellowship which we miss because we have no time. May we suggest a voyage of discovery and recreation in our own homes as the best kind of holiday for most of us this year. It will cost little, and it will be in harmony with the fine temper of simple living and readiness for sacrifice which we want to foster.

As we go to press the air is full of rumours of the imminence of drastic action to restrict the sale of drink. Any measures that have been taken hitherto have been of a very mild character, and were obviously intended to serve the purposes of military discipline. Now the whole question has to be faced as it affects the industrial life of the country. The restriction of the sale of drink to men in uniform, which has been supported in our columns chiefly on the ground of decency and public order, is only one aspect of the much larger problem of keeping all the citizens of the country efficient. Social reformers have long been aware of the terrible wastage due to intemperance, but they have spoken usually to deaf ears. Now the concentrated sense of danger and urgent need has brought us all to our senses, and it seems probable that men of all parties will be forced to accept a measure exceeding anything proposed hitherto by practical statesmen. This result has been achieved, not by agitation, but by the logic of facts.

A DEPUTATION representing the leading shipbuilding firms in the country laid their views on the need of restriction before Mr. Lloyd George and other members of the Government on Monday. The members of the deputation stated that, speaking with the experience of from twenty-five to forty years, they believed that 80 per cent of the present avoidable loss of time could be ascribed to no other cause but drink. The figures of weekly takings in public-houses near the yards were convincing evidence of the increased sale of liquor. Allowing for the enhanced price of intoxicants and for the greater number of men now employed in shipbuilding, the takings had in one case under observation risen 20 per cent, in another 40 per cent. They gave several instances in which important work had been delayed owing to the "drinking habit." It was this rather than drunkenness which was costing the country so dear. In these circumstances the deputation regarded the mere curtailment of facilities as of little use, and plainly hinted at the need of a national measure of total prohibition.

IN his reply Mr. Lloyd George expressed his inability to cast doubt upon the alarming statements which had been made. If the Government had appeared to be a little slow to deal with the matter it was because it was undesirable to introduce severe measures of restriction in advance of the general sentiment of the community. Now, however, the country was beginning to realise the gravity of the position, and workmen themselves were getting more and more prepared to accept very drastic action.

Having gone into this matter [he continued] a great deal more closely during the last few weeks, I must say that I have a growing conviction, based on accumulating evidence, that nothing but root-and-branch methods will be of the slightest avail in dealing with this evil. I believe that to be the general feeling. The feeling is that if we are to settle German militarism we must first of all settle with the drink. We are fighting Germany, Austria, and Drink; and, as far as I can see, the greatest of these three deadly foes is Drink. Success in the war is now purely a question of munitions. I say that, not only on my own authority but on the authority of our great General, Sir John French. He has made it quite clear what his conviction is on the subject. I think I can venture to say that that is also the conviction of the Secretary of State for War, and it is also the conviction of all those who know anything about the military problem—that in order to enable us to win, all we require is an increase, and an enormous increase, in the shells, rifles, and all the other munitions and equipment which are necessary to carry through a great war. You have proved to us to-day quite clearly that the excessive drinking in the works connected with these operations is interfering seriously with that output.

It is significant that this demand for Prohibition is supported by a growing body of opinion in the Trade Unions. Naturally they resent the severe strictures which have been passed upon some skilled trades as a whole owing to excessive drinking by a small minority of the workers. The Executive Committee of the Transport Workers' Federation have promised their support of any measure which the Government may regard as necessary in the following terms :—

We are prepared to support the Government in any drastic restrictions they may deem desirable, provided that they affect all districts alike and all classes alike, thereby removing any suggestion of favourite treatment. We are convinced that, although excessive drinking is indulged in by only a small minority, so interdependent is modern labour that the diminished efficiency of this minority has a marked influence upon the output of the total number of men engaged in any set of operations.

This being so, and in the interests of national well being, we would urge the Government to take immediate and decisive action to reduce the results of intemperance to a minimum. We would, however, suggest that where work is conducted during the night in shipyards, docks, and other places of production some canteen provision should be set up in order to fulfil the requirements of the men for necessary refreshment. Provided that this shall be done, it would meet the requirements of most reasonable workmen.

THERE has been quite a small tempest in the columns of The Times over a sermon preached by the Head Master of Eton at St. Margaret's, Westminster. Probably it will soon sink into oblivion, but as an esteemed correspondent pleads with us to honour Dr. Lyttleton for his courage, one or two words of comment may not be out of place. The passage in the sermon which has been so eagerly discussed was a tentative suggestion that we might surrender Gibraltar to an international commission in return for the neutrality of the Kiel Canal, and by this act of magnanimity establish permanent relations of goodwill with Germany. The question is so highly abstract and academic that it is difficult to take much interest in it. In times of peace it might form a topic for good-natured discussion in the dead season of the year. But now it strikes us as ridiculously inopportune. A man who speaks in a prominent public place at the present time has a heavy burden of responsibility. He must weigh every word. He must guard himself against the possibility of misunderstanding. He must put a severe check upon his fondness for quixotic suggestions, which other people may take too seriously, or even regard as an indication of public opinion in England. On the whole, in the light of his own explanations, we are not inclined to attach much importance to Dr. Lyttleton's sermon, or even to admire his courage. He seems himself to be merely surprised at the outcry, and to be quite unconscious of playing the part of a brave Athanasius contra mundum.

MAY we in this connexion utter a word of warning against the ineffectiveness, which is the besetting snare of many high-minded idealists. We have heard a great deal lately about the need of industrial efficiency, but we want spiritual efficiency as well. We doubt whether those people are the best guardians of the national conscience who are obsessed by the thought of the moral dangers of the war for ourselves. Every big and dangerous duty has its pitfalls and its snares, but we escape them best when we go bravely forward, doing our part as strongly as we can, and giving free play to the natural affections and loyalties of the honest and good heart. We are not going to be saved from the spirit of hatred by continually dwelling upon it with morbid self-consciousness. So far as Germany is concerned, indirect methods are now the best, and, indeed, no others are open to us. We shall keep our natural human feelings, our faith in loving kindness, our trust in men and women of different character and nationality from our own in full and active play by helping our Allies and binding up their wounds, and for hearts so occupied there is little room for hate or vindictiveness. When the time comes for active friendship with Germany again—we know not how long that may be—it is those who have talked least, and not tried to ignore the reality and the rightness of strained relationships at the present time, who will have the biggest influence in restoring goodwill.

* * *

THURSDAY was the centenary of Bismarck's birth. The celebrations in Germany were shorn of much of their splendour. Perhaps in some high quarters there was an uneasy feeling that his memory has no blessing for this war. There is much in his career and his published memoirs which shows how fatally Germany has drifted since his strong hand was withdrawn from the helm. He created the effective machinery of the Empire with Prussia firmly entrenched in despotic control. But it has been used, with a complete absence of high political instinct, to further a policy of personal ambition and sordid intrigue which he would have despised.

A CHARACTER-SKETCH of Bismarck, by Mr. Sidney Whitman, appeared in The Observer on Sunday. It is written with personal knowledge, and does not conceal the frank admiration natural to one who was admitted to the great man's friendship. Its chief interest lies in the confirmation it affords of the view that once the consolidation of the Empire had been achieved the foreign policy of Bismarck ceased to be aggressive. It was never his ambition to dominate the sea, while the necessity of maintaining friendship with England was with him almost a political axiom.

Bismarck [Mr. Whitman writes] was more anxious for the internal consolidation than for the external expansion of Germany. He did not believe that Germany would not prosper without a great Colonial Empire, nor that a fleet rivalling that of Great Britain and threatening the very existence of England was necessary for the protection of Germany's commerce which had the free run of the British Empire.... As a conclusive proof of Bismarck's supreme wish to stand well with England, I can vouch for the following. His last verbal instructions to German diplomatic representatives abroad, more particularly to the Consuls of India and of Egypt, where since his day German intrigue has been rampant, often terminated in the words: "Do all in your power to keep up good relationship with the English. You need not even use a secret cypher in cabling. We have nothing to conceal from the English, for it would be the greatest possible folly for us to antagonise England." Indeed, there can scarcely be people for whose standards of life Bismarck felt greater respect than the English, and none on whose friendship—not even that of Russia, to whom, after all, Germany was indebted for neutrality during the war of 1866 and 1870—on which he set a higher value.

VICTORY.

THE message of Easter is one of victory. It enshrines in one moment of luminous vision the certainty of the immortal love of God, without which Christianity would cease to be a Gospel for the storm-tossed children of men. With what heavenly light this faith in the victory of the soul over pain and death irradiates the pages of the New Testament. How triumphant is the tone with which the apostles announce the good tidings to the world. No buffetings without or perplexities within can ever make them doubt it. To the age-long question, If a man die shall he live again? they have only one answer. "Because Christ lives, we shall live also. If in this life only we have faith in Christ, we are of all men the most miserable."

This faith was not born without a struggle. It did not woo men as a delightful thing in days of affluence and peace. It was the child of agony. If its first teachers were conscious, in the midst of their own glowing confidence, of hesitation and reluctance to accept it, they thought chiefly of the spiritual blindness, which springs from hardness of heart and ease of life and ambitions limited to this world; and their whole effort was directed to the cure of this blindness through the discipline of struggle and the faithful acceptance of the yoke of Christ. It was, in their view, only the clear and simple soul, which learns by the things which it suffers, that can fix its hopes on a glory to be revealed. They asked for heavenly affections as a condition of belief in heaven. This is a hard message to speak at the present time, when our chief emphasis is upon the intellectual difficulties of faith, and we trust far more to argument than to moral discipline to retain a few fragments of Christian belief for our use. If holiness and the vision of God could come to us by thinking, we should have attained long ago. But we possess them only in the proportion in which we share the mind of Christ; and that means that we must bear his yoke.

We have been not a little perplexed to find many earnest men so full of dark forebodings for religion in this agony of the war. Many of us have seen the eclipse of our hopes; but does this mean the eclipse of our faith? Do we only believe in the goodness of God when our schemes of human well-being turn out as we have planned? Has the suffering and crucified Christ lost his power to speak to our souls, when the sun itself is darkened and we ourselves are at the extremity of our need? Surely exactly the opposite is the case. This familiar world which we have loved, and desired so eagerly to enjoy, is passing away visibly before our eyes; but it is still true that he that doeth the will of God abideth for ever. The rather comfortable and unheroic type of Christianity, so familiar to most of us, with its committees for inaugurating an earthly paradise, had almost ceased to cast its plummet into the deep mysteries of the soul, and spoke with a faltering and uncertain sound of the life everlasting. But now, when the dark shadow is stealing into our homes and our young men have flung comfort and worldly ambition to the winds, accepting death rather than dishonour, we are beginning to value things differently. Our comfortable surroundings, our dreams of success, our absorption in the daily care for money and pleasure, had blinded us to the poverty of a religion which has no faith in immortality. Certainly Christianity cannot exist without it. It is an integral part of its revelation of God and its message of human victory. This is a lesson which no argument can teach us. We learn it through the things which we suffer. Many chastened hearts are learning it through the sufferings of this present time.

It is, then, with a note of triumphant joy that we keep the festival of Easter this year. Man's extremity is always God's opportunity. We may be sore buffeted; we may lose much that we hold dear; life may emerge from this ordeal harder in its burden and sterner in its duties; the discipline imposed upon us may try our faith severely; we may have to bear the worst trial of all, when our friends, our children, are wracked with pain, and, having laid their gift on the altar of their country's need, are condemned henceforward to lives of frustrated hope. But the Christian knows that none of these things can separate him from the love of God. And that is enough. It is strength and steadfastness and peace for our wandering feet and our anxious hearts. It is the light of a sure and certain hope flooding the dark valley with heavenly day. It is the confidence of achievement amid the defeat of earthly desires—the sacrifice and victory of Christ turned into spiritual food for the health of our souls.

Good Thoughts for Ebil Times.

AWAKE thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee light.—Ephesians v. 14.

BELOVED, now are we the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be: but we know that, when he shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is. And every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself, even as he is pure.—1 John iii. 2, 3.

THE TEMPORAL AND THE ETERNAL.

WHEN the day comes that we must quit this old familiar world and be torn away from much that we have known and loved on earth, we may pass into regions and worlds unknown, where all besides shall be strange and new, where many of the powers and acquirements of the past shall be superseded, where tongues shall cease and knowledge vanish away; but the soul which loved and lived for Christ, and imbibed the spirit of his life, in which the divine fire of love to God and man has been enkindled, that soul is free of God's universe. In that moment when the tie to earth and earthly things is severed, and it must pass a naked, solitary thing into a world unknown, wherever its destiny may be, unless it can go where God is not, the atmosphere in which it breathes, the elements of its happiness, will still be there, fresh as when it drew the first breath of spiritual life, welling up with inexhaustible fullness from the eternal springs of thought and joy. For "the things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen are eternal."

JOHN CAIRD.

EASTER DAY.

AWAKE, sad heart, whom sorrow ever drowns ;

Take up thine eyes, which feed on earth ;
Unfold thy forehead gathered into frowns :
Thy Saviour comes, and with Him mirth :

Awake, awake ;
And with a thankful heart His comforts take.

*I got me flowers to straw thy way ;
I got me boughs off many a tree :
But thou wast up by break of day,
And brought'st Thy sweets along with Thee.*

GEORGE HERBERT.

O GOD, the King of Glory, who leadest us through the darkness of trouble into the light of immortal day, grant us thy grace in all time of our need that no cross may seem too heavy for us to bear. As we are baptized into the death of Christ so may we be partakers of his risen life and evermore rejoice in thy holy comfort. Amen.

O GOD, the Author of peace and Lover of concord, grant us to be so firmly established in the love of thyself, that no trials whatsoever may be able to part us from thee. Amen.

OUR READING IN WAR TIME.

THE Editor expressed a desire recently to know into what books his readers have dived "for a few moments of forgetfulness and renewal of heart amid the absorbing anxieties of the present."

Most of us, probably, have found ourselves, as he suggests, going back to old favourites. This is partly, I think, because any kind of intellectual concentration has become so extremely difficult that we prefer to re-study a familiar message rather than embark upon the making of fresh acquaintances. Also, we instinctively turn to the highest that we know in this our hour of need, and where we have found inspiration in the past we seek it eagerly to-day. Will it fail? we ask ourselves, knowing that nothing but realities are of any avail at the present moment, and that should the most cherished volumes in our library be found barren of help now they will have proved their worthlessness for all time.

I have a shelf consecrated to the best-beloved of my books. My Dantes are there, a few Franciscan volumes, one or two of the mystics, some Plato, some Euripides, Amiel's 'Journal,' George MacDonald's 'Diary of an Old Soul,' and Emerson. The only one of these which has failed to stand the grim test of war is Amiel. The delicacy and pathetic charm of his thought, the truth and sincerity of his self-analysis, awaking as it does so many answering echoes in the hearts of unsatisfied truth-seekers—of what avail is all this now when we are passionately demanding, not the expression, however tender and beautiful, of the hunger of the human soul for ultimate realities, but the satisfaction of that hunger? Amiel, we have to confess, is merely enervating at such a crisis; he has no message for those who must make decisions—who, however mystical and contemplative their bent may be, must perforce plunge into active life, and throw themselves with vigour upon one side or the other in a great struggle.

But it is of my oldest favourite, Emerson, that I wish to speak. At the hands of modern critics he meets often with scant courtesy. His transcendentalism is sneered at; he is called "the young lady's philosopher." I can only record my own experience, that at this supreme moment his writings have lost no jot of their appeal. He can lift us to heights whence we may contemplate the welter of the world with a serenity that is not selfish but sublime, heights where we realise that "it is only the finite that has wrought and suffered; the infinite lies stretched in smiling repose." But he does not leave us there. Always his most transcendental flights are followed by a swift descent to the daily paths of duty and of action.

To read again the essays on 'Experience,' 'Spiritual Laws,' 'The Over-soul,' and 'Circles' is to be braced up for manly action and decision, to banish the cobwebs of doubt and dismay. He is continually castigating the folly of eternal questioning of life's riddles. "We must set up the strong present tense against all the rumours of wrath, past or to come. So many things are unsettled which it is of the first importance to settle, and pending their settlement, we will do as we will do. Whilst the debate goes forward on the equity of commerce, and will not be closed for a century or two, New and Old England may keep shop."

Neither must we let the burden of an unknown future weigh us down. To try to pierce the veil that hides it is "low curiosity." We who are moved to wonder, as we contemplate the chaos which has taken the place of civilisation,
What shall be the end of these things?
may well take to ourselves Emerson's brave words: "These questions which we lust to ask about the future are a confession of sin. God has no answer for them. No answer in words can apply to a question of things. It is not in an arbitrary 'decree of God,' but in the nature of man, that a veil shuts down on the facts of to-morrow; for the soul will not have us read any other cipher than that of cause and effect. By this veil, which curtains events, it instructs the children of men to live in to-day.
The only mode of obtaining an answer to these questions of the senses is to forgo all low curiosity, and, accepting the tide of being which floats us into the secret of nature, work and live, work and live, and all unawares the advancing soul has built and forged for itself a new condition, and the question and the answer are one."

And those who lament "the failure of the Church" at the present crisis, who see the resources of organised religion tried and found wanting, may rise to broader and more hopeful views when, after reading Emerson's somewhat scathing indictment of our national Church in 'English Traits,' they arrive at his concluding paragraph, and think, as they read it, of the spirit which is sending forth our countrymen with joy to suffer and die for the world's well-being.
"But the religion of England—is it the Established Church? No. Is it the sects? No. They are only perpetuations of some private man's dissent, and are to the Established Church as cabs are to a coach, cheaper and more convenient, but really the same thing.
Where dwells the religion? Tell me first where dwells electricity, or motion, or thought, or gesture. They do not dwell or stay at all... Yet, if religion be the doing of all good, and for its sake the suffering of all evil, 'souffrir de tout le monde et ne faire souffrir personne,' that divine secret has existed in England from the days of Alfred to those of Romilly, of Clarkson, and of Florence Nightingale;
and in thousands who have no fame."

BOOKS AND REVIEWS.

AN IRISH PATRIOT.

The Essays of Thomas Davis. Centenary Edition. Dundalk, at the Dundalgan Press, 3s. 6d. net.

Few books are more stimulating at the present time than those which contain the writings of the world's pure-minded patriots. Mazzini is not only a prophet of nationality, he is also a moral guide through our difficulties, and keeps our faith in an unseen Providence steady while the ground rocks beneath our feet.
The name of Thomas Davis is one to be mentioned in the same breath with his,
for he belongs to the same elect company.
His early death limited his work and cut short its promise, though much of it that remains is of the finest quality; and the fact that he was an Irishman has dulled his lustre in English eyes. But of all the men who worked for the renaissance of Ireland none kindled a more unselfish enthusiasm, or left so imperishable an image of charm and self-devotion.
As a patriot he was endowed with vision and imagination. He called upon his countrymen to fulfil their destiny instead of brooding upon their wrongs. He desired to raise and enrich everything that was distinctive in national gift and character that Ireland might at last take her rightful place in the comity of nations. His creed of patriotism is contained in the following passage:—

"You have a country. The people among whom we were born, with whom we live, for whom, if our minds are in health, we have most sympathy, are those over whom we have power—power to make them wise, great, good.
Reason points out our native land as the field for our exertions, and tells us that without patriotism a profession of benevolence is the cloak of the selfish man; and does not sentiment confirm the decree of reason? The country of our birth, our education, of our recollections, ancestral, personal, national; the country of our loves, our friendships, our hopes; our country —: the cosmopolite is unnatural, base—I would fain say, impossible. To act on a world is for those above it, not of it. Patriotism is human philanthropy."

By the side of this we may place another striking passage in which he appeals to the pride of historical memories, which he and his friends did so much to quicken and revive.

"This country of ours [he says] is no sandbank, thrown up by some recent caprice of earth. It is an ancient land, honoured in the archives of civilization, traceable into antiquity by its piety, its valour, and its sufferings. Every great European race has sent its stream to the river of the Irish mind. Long wars, vast organisations, subtle codes, beacon crimes, leading virtues, and self-mighty men, were here. If we live, influenced by wind and sun and tree, and not by the passions and deeds of the past, we are a thrifless and hopeless people."

Thomas Davis was born at Mallow in 1814. He died of fever in 1845. His short public career has been described in the biography which Sir Charles Gavan Duffy wrote in honour of his friend. His brilliant writing, mostly in the form of articles contributed to the Irish Nation, is fitly represented in this centenary volume. It is the work of a sane idealist, equally removed from the weakness of cosmopolitan sentimentalism, and the hard and relentless temper which feeds the soul of patriotism on the memory of ancient wrongs.

HUGH: MEMOIRS OF A BROTHER. By Arthur Christopher Benson. (London: Smith Elder & Co., 7s. 6d. net.)

MR. A. C. BENSON has written exactly the kind of book which we expected about his brother. There is not a vestige of detachment about it. It is quite as much about himself in relation to Hugh as about Hugh in relation to his family and his world. We are only allowed to see the central figure through the medium of a temperament which had more instinctive affection than understanding sympathy. And so this study strikes as an external just in regard to the matters which are of most interest, the deeper springs of religion, the spiritual unrest which found its peace in Rome, and the sources of the preacher's power over other souls. These are matters upon which his Roman Catholic friends will be eager to write. Meanwhile, we may be grateful for what the book gives us instead of grumbling at its limitations. For there is much in it that is attractive and revealing. It gives an admirable picture of an educated English home, and the relations of frank comradeship among the young people, their argumentativeness, their criticism, and beneath it all their delight in one another's society, and their complete loyalty to the family group. Mr. Benson emphasises the tolerance of differences as specially characteristic of his home life and the absence of any attempt to weaken the sense of personal responsibility or to curb the freedom of individual choice. "No one can really understand Hugh's life," he writes, "without a knowledge of what my mother was to him—an equal friend, a trusted adviser, a candid critic, and a tender mother as well. And even when he went his own way, as he did about health and work, though she foresaw only too clearly what the end might be, and, indeed, what it actually was, she always recognized that he had a right to live as he chose, and to work as he desired." Equally attractive is the description of the country house at Hare Street, which was Hugh Benson's home for several years. The garden, the chapel, and the old-fashioned rooms with their books and artistic decoration combine to make one of the pictures of quiet and good-mannered charm, neither too grave nor yet too gay, which are familiar to readers of Mr. Benson's other books. It would have been better if the chapter which deals with the death-bed scene had been left unwritten. There are things which may only be spoken about in broken sentences among intimates. Anything else is an offence against reticence, and violates the sacred privacy of death. The volume contains a number of striking portraits and other illustrations.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

THE STORY OF DANTE.

III.—THE TRAVELLER.

It has been said lately of our new soldiers that the outdoor life, with training in looking into the distance, has improved their eyesight, so that some have been able to give up wearing glasses. The poet Dante had been a great reader, a great student, and had suffered, we are told, from his eyes. Perhaps his outdoor life as exile and traveller, with the habit of looking into the distance, improved his sight also for near objects. For he seems to have had wonderfully good eyes for all that is beautiful and interesting in this world of ours. As a wanderer from place to place he would travel mostly on foot. He seems to have noticed different sorts of scenery, and can give us word-pictures of all sorts of places from snowy Alps to flat Flanders with its banks to keep out the sea. He also noticed ships and trees moving in the wind, the falling of leaves in autumn, and flowerets bent and closed in the chilly night but reviving in the sunshine. He observed the habits of animals and birds. He watched with interest all sorts of people at their various trades, occupations, and amusements. He noticed children too—children in trouble, children happy at their play, or "hungry," "spoilt," "greedy," "won with an apple," "frightened," "ashamed." Once, when telling something about the stars, he describes a child skipping and the line the rope makes as it goes round.

Dante must often have looked into the far distance as he walked. He so often tells of distant views. He must often have looked up into the sky and watched the clouds, the flight of birds, the movements of the sun, moon, planets, and stars. He knew much about astronomy, and was familiar with the aspect of the heavens at all times. He could tell the time of day or night by the sun and stars. He was accustomed to think of the earth as a sphere in space, and he could imagine how the sun, moon, and planets and stars would look from any other part of the earth. He would know, therefore, what time it would be at any other place. In this way he could see, as it were, what was out of sight.

In the Belgian story by Maeterlinck, the boy Tyltyl, who is sent by the fairy to seek the Blue Bird, has very good sight. He says he can see the time by the church clock. That is good, the fairy says, but it is not good enough. He has to see more than that, he has to see the inside of things, the souls of things; he has to see the past and the future. He had to see what is out of sight. To find the Blue Bird Tyltyl needed what we call insight and imagination, to be able to look into the unseen. We call it seeing with the inward eye, "the mind's eye"; but it is also like feeling inwardly. We say "Do you see?" when we mean "Do you understand?" "Do you feel it?" We all have this magic diamond of imagination, especially poets. But it is only a poet who can by word-pictures make visible for us the beautiful visions of his inward sight. A true poet can help us to see and feel and understand.

Accustomed to look into the far distance, Dante looked forward also into the unseen future. On his solitary journeys he had plenty of time for day-dreams, visions of what might be. He was an idealist, a dreamer of dreams, a seer of visions. He became the great poet of the unseen. With a poet's fancy and a patriot's enthusiasm he imagined what the world would be under a government as good as he could plan it. At one time, indeed, he hoped that a ruler was coming from beyond the Alps to restore order in Italy, and establish an ideal Empire. But Dante was disappointed once more, and by degrees he realised that even the best men as rulers could not make other people good. Each one has to learn for himself and try for himself. He came to see that the only way for the world to grow better is for each one to do his best, for each one to try to be better, and to go on trying. If we were all idealists like that the world would soon be different.

LILLIAN HALL.

MEMORIAL NOTICE.

MR. H. J. BAKEWELL.

We regret to announce the death of Mr. Herbert James Bakewell, at his home in Hampstead, at the age of 81. He was the third son of the late F. C. Bakewell, scientific author and inventor of an electric telegraph for the facsimile transmission of handwriting, and a grandson of Robert Bakewell, the first English geologist. He entered the engineering office of the Admiralty at Woolwich in 1856, and was transferred to Keyham and then to Whitehall, where he became an Engineer Inspector, upon whose inspections and certificates marine engines made by contractors to the value of £7,000,000 were passed into the service, and all with satisfactory results. In the course of his experience he made many valuable suggestions for improvements which were adopted. He retired in 1898, after a successful professional career, and will long be remembered for many acts of kindness and generosity, and as a man of unblemished character and sterling integrity. For many years he was an active member of Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead, during the ministries of Dr. Sadler and Dr. Brooke Herford.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

COUNCIL MEETING.

A MEETING of the Council of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association was held at Essex Hall on March 30, at 3.30, the President, Mr. J. F. L. Brunner, M.P., in the chair. There were present Sir Edgar Chatfeild-Clarke, Mr. H. Chatfeild-Clarke (Treasurer), Mr. R. P. Jones (Chairman of the Home Missions Committee), the Rev. W. Wooding, Mrs. Wooding (Chairman of the Publications Committee), Mrs. Bartram, Mrs. Aspland, Miss Lister, Miss F. Hill, Miss Taylor, Miss Martineau, Miss Lake, Miss Burkitt, Miss H. Brooke Herford, the Revs. W. G. Tarrant (Chairman of the Executive Committee), F. Summers, V. D. Davis, J. Harwood, W. W. C. Pope, and Dr. Tudor Jones, Mr. Percy Preston, Mr. Ion Pritchard, Mr. T. B.

Taylor, Mr. C. F. Pearson, Mr. J. Sudbury, Mr. F. W. Turner, the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie (Secretary), and the Rev. T. P. Spedding (Missionary Agent).

After reading the Minutes the Secretary, the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, read the Report, prefacing it by a short account of the War Distress Work carried on at Essex Hall during the past eight months to assist "alien enemies" of the liberal faith stranded in London, and in other ways to minister to the necessities of combatants and non-combatants alike in our own country and on the Continent. To these and other efforts, including the help given by Miss Brooke Herford in London, and Miss Van Eck in Holland, in establishing communications between friends and relatives anxious for news of each other attention has already been drawn in these columns, as also to the general work of the Association dealt with in the Report. The grave national crisis through which we are passing has naturally affected the activities of the Association to some extent, and it has been found necessary to postpone, for the present, some new missionary efforts which would otherwise have been put into operation this year. The work of the Missionary Agent and the Pioneer Preachers is dealt with in a separate report, from which we hope to give some extracts next week. The present time is hardly opportune for the continuance of the Van Mission Meetings, which have accordingly been discontinued, but the Committee has decided to organise an Open-Air Mission this summer, in which Ministers and Lay-Preachers are invited to help, in order to take some share in an effort to strengthen the religious thoughts and aspirations of men which is urgently needed if the world is to be saved from a repetition of the conflict now being waged. Three additions to the series of Modern Handbooks of Religion, of which three volumes have already been published, are in preparation—"Communion of Man with God," by the Rev. R. Nicol Cross; 'Christ and Christianity in the Twentieth Century,' by the Rev. Alfred Hall; and 'The Revelations of God in Nature and in Man,' by the Rev. Dr. Thackray. The war has led to the issue of a good many publications, the most recent being six "War-Time Leaflets," which include 'The Religious Spirit that Befits this Crisis,' by the Rev. John Hamilton Thom; 'Non-Resistance,' from a letter of Dr. Channing's written in 1829; 'War and Religion' and 'Christians, Awake!' reprinted from The Times Literary Supplement by permission. Colonial and foreign work and the McQuaker Trust are also dealt with at length in the Report. The financial statement shows that, owing to the fact that some of the committee's plans have had to be temporarily abandoned, the Treasurer has an unexpected balance in hand. The receipts for the year amounted to £6,015, the expenditure being £5,728. The death is recorded with deep regret of four honoured members of the Council—Mr. William Long (President of the Association 1893-4), Miss Emily Sharpe, Miss Mary Martineau, and Mr. Clive Fleetwood Pritchard. To their relatives the Committee tender their respectful sympathy.

The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the Report, referred to the losses they had sustained by death. In commenting on the record of work which they had just heard he alluded appreciatively to the valuable assistance to their cause which was being given by the Pioneer Preachers. In regard to finance, he was particularly glad, he added, that in these troubled times, when it was so necessary that economy should be practised, even if it involved the curtailment of cherished schemes, they were setting the example of making both ends meet. The Rev. J. Harwood, in seconding the resolution, expressed the pleasure of the members of the Council at welcoming Mr. Brunner in their midst for the first time in his official capacity. The resolution was carried.

The Anniversary Meetings will take place as usual during Whit-week. A religious service will be held at Essex Church on Tuesday, May 25, when the Rev. V. D. Davis will be the preacher. Wednesday will be devoted to the annual business meeting and conference on the work of the Association. The Public Meeting on May 26 will be addressed by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, Dr. Mellor, Mr. R. M. Montgomery, and Mrs. Sydney Martineau on 'The Moral and Religious Implications of the War.' A Conference of Ministers on 'The War as it has Affected our Ministry and Congregations' will be held on Thursday, May 27, Dr. Estlin Carpenter delivering the opening address, and the Conversazione will be held the same evening, this year at Essex Hall. Meetings of the Sunday School Association, British Women's League, Central Postal Mission, Lay Preachers' Union, and Temperance Association will also be held during the week.

A draft letter was read by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, with the suggestion that it should be sent to the Rev. T. L. Marshall, who this week attains his 90th year, expressing in cordial and affectionate terms the Association's appreciation of Mr. Marshall's lifelong labours on behalf of liberal religious ideals in his capacity of journalist, and at one time editor of THE INQUIRER and minister alike. Mr. C. F. Pearson warmly endorsed the proposal, which met with the approval of all present. The letter will accordingly be sent.

THE LIVERPOOL DISTRICT MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION. ANNUAL MEETING.

THE Annual Meeting of the Liverpool District Missionary Association was held at Ullet Road Church Hall, on Saturday, March 20, when the Report and Accounts for the year were presented. The Report includes interesting summaries of work by the Minister of the Association (the Rev. H. D. Roberts) and the Rev. G. Pegler (Crewe), the Rev. Walter Short (Bootle), and the Rev. Charles Roper (West Kirby). A detailed statement of the financial position of the Association takes up a large proportion of the General Report. The serious loss suffered by the deaths of Mr. Philip H. Holt and Mr. Alfred Booth is placed on record.

The chair was taken by Mr. A. S. Thew (President of the Association). The Chairman, touching on some of the salient points of the Report, spoke with deep regret of the death of Mr. P. H. Holt. He rejoiced to be able to say that, though old friends were passing away, they had among them young men who were showing equal zeal and great ability. He commented on the faithful labour of the ministers, and referred to the removal from the district of the Rev. S. H. Street, who was followed by their good wishes. A meeting-room had been acquired at 70, Lord Street—a great want for a long time—which would prove of service to the community in many ways. He spoke with much appreciation of the work of Mr. Roberts. His labours had been cut short by the war, and their sympathy was with him in the disappointments of the situation. The resolution was seconded by the Rev. A. E. Parry (Liscard).

Mr. Lawrence Holt moved a vote of confidence in, and sympathy with, the work of the ministers. At the present time circumstances were very discouraging to the spiritual worker. The hopes of their Minister-at-large had suffered a limitation owing to finance and to war. The war had upset all outward conditions. None of them knew what would happen to any one of them. Everything was suspended indefinitely. They were faced with the danger of desolation of soul during these terrible times. Sometimes it seemed as if the very foundation of religion were removed. The elemental virtues should be their sole refuge while they were faced with this calamity. His sympathy was with the Minister in his frustrated plans and with all the ministers in their good work. They looked to them to maintain in their midst all confidence and hope, that they might still have light to see the Master's footprints even in these dark days, and that they might help all to see still that "God is Good." Mr. Arthur Hall seconded the resolution, and short speeches in acknowledgment were made by the Revs. G. Pegler, W. Short, and C. Roper.

The Rev. H. D. Roberts made an earnest appeal for increased subscriptions, and spoke with enthusiasm of the opportunities of the Association. He described the very hopeful conditions at St. Helens, and acknowledged with gratitude the services of the lay-preachers. Difficulties were made to be overcome, and when normal times at last returned he hoped for still greater determination on the part of the Association to do what was expected and required of it.

The officers for the year were proposed by the Rev. J. C. Odgers and seconded by the Rev. T. Lloyd-Jones. The Rev. H. W. Hawkes moved a vote of thanks to the Chairman and to Ullet Road Church for the use of their Hall. The Rev. C. Craddock, in seconding, said that that meeting had been profitable beyond any in his recollection of the Association. He had felt the difficulty of speaking to purpose during these last months. It had been a time for silence rather than for speech. He was very grateful for the sympathy that had been expressed for their work. Mr. Thew briefly responded, and the meeting concluded.

AMERICAN SYMPATHY.

THE REV. LYMAN M. GREENMAN writes to us from Quincy, Illinois, as follows. We need scarcely point out the happy evidence which his letter affords of the deeper currents of sympathy with England even in districts in the United States where there is a large German element in the population.

I have read THE INQUIRER for the last fifteen years, but never with so much interest as during the last six months. Thoughtful men about me are saying: "Germany must not win"; "the world can't afford to let Germany win." Quincy is the third largest city in Illinois, and strongly pro-German in its sympathies, owing to the fact that about two-thirds of the population are of German descent. About one-half the families in my congregation have German names; nevertheless, we held a week ago a special service in celebration of the centennial of peace between Great Britain and the United States. The crowded church seemed to attest the interest of the congregation in the special purpose of the service. A few days later I addressed the pupils and teachers of the High school on the occasion of Washington's birthday. My introductory remarks met with such cordial response on the part of the five hundred pupils and the local chapter of the Daughters of the American Revolution, that I am encouraged to send you a copy of my introduction.

"February 22 has always meant much to me. Where I lived as a boy we always made a glad holiday of Washington's birthday; all business was suspended, the schools were closed, and the bells all over the city were rung morning, noon, and night. When I grew older, I learnt that Sarah Flower Adams, the author of 'Nearer My God to Thee' was born on February 22, and so was our patriot and man of letters, James Russell Lowell. Many years later, when I was a student in Manchester College, Oxford, I discovered that the college I was attending was founded on February 22. But what appealed most to my pride as a child was to know that my grandmother Folger was born on the very day Washington was 58 years old. It is not surprising, therefore, to know that grandmother named her first son George Washington. One of my earliest recollections is of an incident related to me by my mother concerning her brother George, who was in 1815 three years old.

"It appears that my great-grandfather's sloop Polly Folger, the packet sailing weekly, 'tide and weather permitting,' between Noods Holl and Nantucket, one hundred years ago, just as the sun was dipping below the long low prairie of the sea, crossed the bar, rounded Brant Point, and warped up to Long Wharf. The mail was flung ashore, the skipper 'dug aloft,' and from the rattlings announced to the crowd on the wharf the welcomed news of the Treaty of Peace. Whereupon my grandfather, who happened to be on the fringe of the crowd, flew to the old church tower, and eagerly grasping the bell rope clanged out the joyful news that peace had been established. My grandmother, overcome by the news, wept for joy. She was thinking of her only brother, a young super-cargo of an American merchantman who had been captured by the English and confined for many months in Dartmoor Prison. And she had other dear ones on the high seas. But my little uncle George, on being told that the bells were ringing for joy, breaking away from his mother, ran down the quaint old Nantucket streets shouting in childish excitement: 'Peace, peace, the bells are ringing for Mr. Joy.' It seems a Mr. David Joy was one of grandmother's neighbours. This bedtime story used to amuse me when I was a lad; but as I grew older, I came to value it more and more for the comment my mother would add from time to time. Though the dear uncle died in the wretched English prison, yet my mother would say: 'It was all a mistake; a national blunder that will never happen again. Peace has been maintained these sixty years, my son, surely it will never be broken; for are not the British our cousins? Did we not have the same forebears in Norfolk, Lincoln, and Essex? And besides we are Christians; we are Christian and peace-loving nations.' 'But mother, don't you remember the British destroyed great-grandfather's property in Newport. Look, mother; look over there through the trees across the river; there is Bunker Hill.' 'Yes, my son, but that, too, was a mistake; a glorious mistake. Believe what I say, the British are our friends, our relatives, our cousins; never forget it; say so when you are a man, and help our country to live in peace with England and all other countries.' You see with all our bell-ringing on Washington's birthday, Independence Day, and Bunker Hill Day, I was reared in an atmosphere of goodwill toward the British, and taught to believe they were our friends. When I grew to man's estate, I found that history confirmed my mother's instruction. But my greatest delight was to have actual first-hand experience of the fact. During a delightful year spent in England, I was made to feel by every sign and ritual of friendliness and goodwill that I was a guest of the English people."

VACATION TERM FOR BIBLICAL STUDY.

It is hoped to hold the thirteenth Vacation Term for Biblical Study this year at Cambridge from July 24 to August 14. The object of the term is to give to students of the Bible who feel the need of more scientific and intelligent study a special opportunity of becoming acquainted with the results of modern Biblical scholarship, and of receiving systematic instruction on academic and undenominational lines. The idea running through the entire series of lectures this year is that of 'The Redemption of the World through Suffering.' The inaugural address will be given by the Bishop of Ely, and courses of lectures have been promised by Dr. Swete, Regius Professor of Divinity, Cambridge; Dr. Whitehouse, Cheshunt College, Cambridge; Canon Nairne, Professor of Hebrew, King's College, London; the Rev. S. C. Carpenter, Selwyn College, Cambridge; Dr. Oesterley, Jesus College, Cambridge; and Miss F. Rosamond Shields, M.A., Warden of the Household and Social Science Department, King's College for Women, University of London. Single lectures will also be given by Prof. van Hoonacker, the Rev. B. T. D. Smith, and the Rev. Wilfrid Moulton. Particulars may be had on application to Miss E. Lawder, Secretary, 25, Halifax Road, Cambridge.

In a letter to the Rev. C. J. Street Dr. Boros writes from Hungary as follows, under date February 20:—"Perhaps some change will soon be in this terrible war. Anyhow, I expect to meet you and my English friends, to whom my sympathy and brotherly feeling does not change, whatever may happen among the nations. Please assure our good Unitarians that on the whole we are satisfactorily well here. Of course, thousands of our good men are on the fields, and many of them we shall not see in life, but that cannot be otherwise. Our work is going on much the same as before. We are praying every day that God may put an end to this war."

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Bolton.—In response to THE INQUIRER appeal for funds in aid of the Belgian hospitals, a Grand Concert was held recently in the Bolton Street Chapel schoolroom. The arrangements were in the hands of Mrs. Isherwood, Miss Jean Crook, and Mrs. Hewitt, the Secretaries of the Social Union. Mrs. John Harwood presided, and the following artistes provided an interesting and attractive programme: Misses Minnie Pilkington, Stephanie Baker, Hilda Scoweroft, Doris Pickup, Messrs. Launcelot Quinn, A. Wilkes, Foden Williams, and Tony Wilson. Dr. Rigby officiated at the piano. The tastefully decorated schoolroom was filled by a large and appreciative audience, and the concert resulted in a gain of £20, which sum has been sent to Mrs. Bernard Allen, Hampstead, as a contribution to the funds.

Bristol: Domestic Mission.—The Annual Meeting of the Lewin's Mead Domestic Mission was held on March 22 at the hall in Lower Montague Street, Mr. Charles Cole presiding, when a satisfactory Report of the year's work was presented by the Hon. Secretary, Mr. E. Sibree. Under Mr. Thomas Gaylard, who had succeeded the Rev. Thomas Graham as missionary, the Sunday Services and weekday meetings had been well attended, and it was gratifying to learn that the decided improvement which had taken place in the tone of the neighbourhood had been attributed in no small degree to the beneficial influence of the Mission. The Statement of Accounts presented by Mr. J. Kenrick Champion showed a balance in hand of over £6. Mr. Gaylard, in making his report, alluded to the suffering caused by the war, which had greatly increased their responsibilities, and to the hundreds of visits which he had paid to people in distress. He had endeavoured to follow the line taken by his predecessors, and make the Mission a real Domestic Mission to the poor. It had always been carried on in a purely undenominational spirit, and any help he had been able to give had been tendered without distinction of creed or religious belief. A vote of thanks to Mr. and Mrs. Gaylard was proposed by Mr. W. J. Adams, seconded by Miss Worsley, and heartily carried. Thanks were also accorded to the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, the Rev. Dr. Beckh, and Mr. Gaylard for their sermons on behalf of the Mission. At the close of the meeting the Chairman presented Mr. W. G. Fry with a cheque in appreciation of his twenty-five years' service as organist. It was also mentioned that on the previous day Mr. Fry completed fifty years' service at Lewin's Mead Sunday School.

Bristol: Lewin's Mead.—The announcement of the resignation of the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, who has been Minister of Lewin's Mead Chapel for nearly forty-nine years, has been received by the members of the congregation with much regret. The information was conveyed to them at the Annual Meeting, and a deputation was appointed to wait upon Mr. Blatchford and ask him to reconsider his decision. This, however, he is unable to do through considerations of health, and at a subsequent meeting a resolution was passed expressing the heartfelt gratitude of the subscribing members to Mr. Blatchford for his long and faithful service as minister and friend, and the hope that he may enjoy his retirement from active service for many years to come. The Western Daily Press, in an article reviewing Mr. Blatchford's long connection with the religious life of Bristol, speaks of the love and respect which he has won in that city, and of the regret that will be felt by thousands of people representing every phase of its life in losing him from their midst. When he first went to Bristol, it was as assistant to the Rev. William James, and when the latter died ten years later he took sole charge. The various institutions connected with Lewin's Mead found in him an enthusiastic supporter, and he held many offices. He was President of the Cambrian Society in 1893, and afterwards became President of the Devonians in Bristol. Mr. Blatchford has always been a very happy speaker, and some of his most genial addresses were given at the annual banquets of the Bristol and West of England Newspaper Press Fund, as a result of which he was affectionately called the "Press Fund Chaplain." It is the intention of Mr. and Mrs. Blatchford to spend the rest of their days in some quiet place in Devon, and the most cordial wishes for the enjoyment of a well-earned rest will follow them in their retirement.

Manchester Domestic Mission.—The Annual Meeting was held on March 23 at Renshaw Street Mission, the President, Mr. G. H. Leigh, J.P., being in the chair. The Reports which were presented showed that the Society had this year special reason for feeling the importance and value of the Missions, because in the great crisis through which the country is passing they can make their influence felt in the densely populated districts of Hulme and Collyhurst. When the war began, it was decided to place the Missions as far as possible at the disposal of the civic authorities for emergency work. At Renshaw Street a workroom was opened, where women affected by the war have been employed under the direction of Mrs. Timmis. The Willert Street rooms are similarly being used for the additional work which has been undertaken by the School for Mothers. The President expressed the great appreciation felt by the Committee for the high level of efficiency maintained by the Rev. A. W. Timmis in his work at Willert Street, and emphasised especially the debt that was owing to the self-sacrificing labours of Mrs. Timmis. The Committee were also grateful to the Rev. W. F. Turland, who had thrown himself so energetically into the work at Willert Street, of which he has had temporary charge during the winter months. The meeting had the pleasure of hearing an address from the Rev. T. Lloyd Jones, who dwelt usefully on parallels and contrasts between the needs that are met by the Domestic Missions in Liverpool and Manchester. He pleaded strongly for the holding of another Domestic Mission Conference, and urged that it should be held in Manchester.

London: Blackfriars Mission and Stamford Street Chapel.—The Annual Meeting was held on Monday evening, March 29, Mr. J. F. L. Brunner, M.P., President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, being in the chair. The Committee's Report was read by the Hon. Secretary, Mr. A. A. Tayler, and the Statement of Accounts by the Hon. Treasurer, Mr. W. S. Tayler. The former chronicles a year of steady work, which has been carried on with enthusiasm in spite of the trying times through which all Missions, and other religious institutions, are passing on account of the war. The Men's Club has, of course, suffered greatly owing to the withdrawal of many members in response to the nation's call to arms, no fewer than fifty-nine having joined the colours. In consequence of the very high prices also the Coal Club has broken down temporarily. The Mission has sustained heavy losses during the year through the death of Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence, Mr. Nathaniel Waterall, Mr. James Welch, Mr. and Mrs. C. J. Fry, Mr. Nathaniel Manning Tayler, Mr. Hugh Martineau, Miss Mary Martineau, and Mr. T. P. Warren, all valued friends and supporters of the work of the Mission, and the financial position gives cause for some anxiety. Neither energy nor zeal are lacking, however, on the part of the Minister, the Rev. W. J. Piggott, whose efforts are loyally shared by Mrs. Piggott and a faithful band of workers; and the Committee's Report ends on a note of hopefulness and courage. Mr. Piggott emphasised in his report the atmosphere of worshipfulness which characterises the activities of the Mission, and constitutes the central purpose of the fellowship that meets in Stamford Street Chapel. Since the outbreak of the war the work of relief has been exceptionally heavy; but gradually the strain has lessened, and unemployment is now practically confined to theatrical workers, printers, and women and girl workers. Out of 127 cases personally investigated, work has been found for 103, and permanent work for 71; but the Minister urges that great help can be given by those who can give odd jobs to people out of work in winter and summer alike, as these often help to keep the home together and tide over a difficult period. The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the Reports, expressed his pleasure at being amongst the friends of the Mission once more, and sitting in the chair which his father had occupied. He felt that Mr. Piggott was happy in his description of their work as plough work. The Mission did indeed tear up the traditional, disturb the commonplace, and sometimes use novel methods, and in so doing it prepared the way for the fruitful work which followed. Miss Francis seconded the resolution, which was carried. Mr. Percy Preston proposed, and Mr. Pain seconded, the resolution recommending the Committee and officers for the ensuing year; and Mr. C. F. Pearson moved that the hearty thanks of the meeting be given to Mr. Piggott and all who have assisted in the work of the Mission and Chapel during the past year. The Rev. W. C. Bowie, in seconding, referred to the great changes which had taken place in the general attitude to social work, and the increasing responsibilities which the State has taken upon itself in ameliorating the conditions of the people since Domestic Missions were first started. He urged, however, that too much reliance should not be placed on the growth of a vast mechanism of relief which in some ways did away with the close contact between mind and mind, between heart and heart, which was more needed at the present time than ever it was. One of the great things which a Mission like that had to do was to nourish and strengthen this personal human contact, and in looking back he was glad to think that the work had always been done by men with a certain individuality of their own, differing from each other in many respects, who had made their personality felt. The resolution was carried, and the proceedings closed with a vote of thanks to Mr. Brunner, proposed by Mr. A. A. Tayler, and seconded by Mr. Quarmby.

Leeds.—Speaking at the evening service last Sunday at Mill Hill Chapel the Rev. Charles Hargrove referred to the fact that all controversy is silenced in the face of the national crisis. They could understand well how it should be so on the field of battle, for argument was necessarily silenced when men were brought to face the mighty issues of life and death; but as it was at the front, so it was, more or less, at home. Alike in religion as in politics, questions which seemed, and which were, of immense importance only a year ago, things about which they argued, about which in politics they would fight, things about which they spent their money and invited controversy—about those things they were silent now. Honour, peace, freedom; with those at stake who should turn aside to argue about doctrines and measures of reform? What then, had the contending churches to say in this great time of the nation's trial? A hush as of the house of death had fallen upon the churches, and men had ceased to attack the doctrines of others, and ceased to defend their own. They were compelled by the seriousness of the situation to get down to the foundations upon which all doctrines of all churches were reared. It mattered very much what a man believed, what church or creed he belonged to, for if he held to it sincerely, his thoughts and character were moulded thereby. But then they asked how to be absolutely sure, without a shadow of doubt, that their belief was the truth, and their disbelief was all that was untrue. God's judgment, however, was not according to beliefs; His judgment was on what a man was, not what he was reputed to be, not even what he had done.

Manchester: Longsight.—A two days' Sale of Work for the purpose of reducing a debt of nearly £300 was held in the Gaskell Hall on Saturday and Monday last. The chair was taken on Saturday by Mr. P. M. Oliver, and the Sale was opened by Mrs. Hans Renold. On Monday the chair was taken by the minister, the Rev. B. C. Constable, and the opening ceremony was performed by Mrs. Henry Turner of Stockport. The sum of £85 was realised.

Poole.—A large number of soldiers encamped in the neighbourhood of Poole come into the town to spend the week-ends, and are entertained by various organisations. They are given free entertainments, beds, and breakfast. On Sunday mornings there is a Church Parade, the various churches being visited in succession. On March 21, for the third time, the soldiers attended at the Unitarian Church, about 300 being present. The service was conducted by the Rev. W. B. Matthews, the preacher being the Rev. H. Shaen Solly, the former minister.

Tunbridge Wells.—The Rev. S. Burrows, who for six years was minister of the Free Christian Church at Hastings, will conduct the services at the Unitarian Church, Dudley Institute, during April and part of May.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

TRAINING IN SOCIAL SERVICE FOR THE YOUNG.

The Schools Personal Service Association, of which Dr. H. E. Piggott, Head Master of the Hornsey County School, is Chairman, has been started with the object of cultivating in boys and girls of all classes that mutual understanding and sympathy, based on ideals of mutual responsibility and service, which the Personal Service Association pre-supposes in its adult members. It is believed that a nation linked from top to bottom in childhood in this way will soon be purged of many of the evils from which we and past generations have suffered, but, up to the present time, the subject has received far too little attention in discussions on child-training. The whole aim of the Association is educational, and it is felt to be very desirable that the work should not proceed along the lines of a cut-and-dried programme giving little scope for personal initiative and individual capacity and inclination. There are, of course, all sorts of methods which will at once suggest themselves, such as study circles, the development of natural friendships through visits or letters or gifts of flowers to the sick, little lectures to younger children by elder scholars, and so on; but the great thing is to arouse the active interest of the boys and girls in other peoples' lives, and cultivate the spirit of co-operation and goodwill. Membership is open to all teachers and others, now or formerly directly connected with schools, and past and present pupils of 18 years and upwards. The Secretary is Mr. W. E. Gibbard, 41, Warren Road, Hornsey, N.

LAMB AND CARLYLE MANUSCRIPTS IN AMERICA.

According to The Times one of the finest and most important of Lamb's MSS. which has ever come into the market—that of the play 'Pride's Cure (John Woodvil),' entirely in the hand of Charles and Mary Lamb—together with the complete autograph MS. of Carlyle's 'The Guises,' which tells the story of the house of Guise from about 1520 to 1679, and has not hitherto been published, were recently sold in Philadelphia. The former was sent by Lamb to his friend Thomas Manning, accompanied by a letter, in which he says: "I have scratched out a good deal, as you will see. Generally what I have rejected was either false in feeling, or a violation of character, mostly of the first sort." The Carlyle MS. was purchased by Charles Scribners' Sons.

BIRDS AND THE WAR ONCE MORE.

A London correspondent to The Manchester Guardian recently commented on the number of newly arrived chaffinches in the parks and gardens just now, expressing his opinion that their exceptional numbers was due entirely to the war. This is not, it would seem, merely a far-fetched idea. "Bird authorities agree that the tumult on the Continent caused by the Franco-Prussian War in 1870 caused a very large addition to the bird population of the British Isles. The birds, scared from their customary haunts, sought refuge here. Some varieties little known in England 'occurred' (as the naturalists say) very frequently that year, and specially notable was the increase in the number of that most splendid—both in size and colour—specimen of his family, the hawfinch. In some cases the increase became permanent; the fledglings of the refugees instinctively came back to their own birthplaces in the following season. A little later it may be possible to put the theory of war disturbance to a closer test. We have comparatively few goldfinches in normal times; Belgium is full of them. A heavy flight of goldfinch immigrants, therefore, will be convincing."

TOLSTOY'S MANUSCRIPTS.

After considerable litigation the question of the ownership of Tolstoy's literary remains has been decided in favour of the Countess Tolstoy. She has presented the collection as a free gift to the Rumyantsev Museum, Moscow, where a special room, to be known as the Cabinet of Count L. N. Tolstoy; will be set apart for them. Arrangements have been made by which the Petrograd Academy of Science will have the privilege of taking photographic copies of the MSS., and the Countess also consents to the publication by the Academy, without payment or royalty, of an edition of Tolstoy's works, provision being made in regard to the voluminous Diaries that such intimate passages as certain members of the family may consider it undesirable to give to the world at present shall be struck out. Duplicate photographic copies will, however, be made of the Diaries, one of which is to be sealed up till the death of the last of Tolstoy's children.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.

THURSDAY was the birthday of King Albert, and it was fitly celebrated by the announcement of a victory of some importance by the intrepid Belgian army on the Yser. He is still master of troops who refuse to be beaten or to bate one jot of heart or hope in face of misfortunes which would have broken the spirit of most men. By the serenity of his courage and the dignified simplicity with which he has done his duty he has won a trust and affection which it is not the usual lot of kings to enjoy. We can honour him best by helping his people. Let us also remember that in the noble traits of his character he is not a solitary portent. The same fixity of purpose and capacity for quiet endurance are to be seen in thousands of his subjects. We have spoken elsewhere of the impression made upon us by the doctors in the Belgian military hospitals. They are men of whom King Albert has every right to be proud. We can give them no higher praise than this, that they are not unworthy of the example which he has set them.

THE control of the Drink Traffic has become the subject of absorbing interest at home. The newspapers, which have never had a good word for "temperance faddists" in time of peace, are now clamouring for prohibition. It is a strange spectacle, and a good deal of the discussion shows more instinct for the sensational dramatic touch than capacity for wise judgment. Meanwhile the Government, well aware of the danger of measures of coercion which offend public opinion, is proceeding slowly. A measure of total prohibition is unlikely, and is felt, even by strenuous temperance advocates, to be undesirable at the present moment. But some legislative action is clearly necessary. We hope very earnestly that there will be prohibition of spirits, the source of most of the mischief, and a large reduction of hours. On the question of compensation to the trade, what is fair and equitable must be done out of the public purse. It is no time for the shibboleths of our own party. We have got to act in a spirit of trust and cordiality with men who may differ widely from ourselves about the general principles of temperance legislation.

APPARENTLY much is hoped from a movement of voluntary abstinence. The King has forbidden the use of alcoholic drink in the royal household during the war. Lord Kitchener has followed his example, and it is said that the members of the Cabinet will impose the same rule upon themselves. No doubt this will go a long way to make abstinence fashionable, and to remove the reproach that it is the habits of the working-man which are being attacked, while the rich, with their clubs and well-furnished cellars, remain immune. There are, however, large sections of English society which are affected very little by example in high places, and we fear that voluntaryism alone will not solve the difficulty, though it will go a long way towards removing some of the most obstinate hindrances to drastic legislation.

THE action of the King will undoubtedly have a far-reaching effect upon our social habits long after the war is over. The temperance reformer will be regarded as a wise and reasonable person in quarters which hitherto have remained impervious to his influence; while the total abstainer will cease to be the victim of bad names and foolish jokes. If the drink bill of the nation is appreciably reduced by this policy of voluntary abstinence, it is unlikely that it will resume the old scale of wasteful extravagance when the war is over. Health and physique will be improved, and crime will be reduced by the discovery that we can be strong and happy and convivial without the stimulus of strong drink.

THE German Government has sent a remonstrance with a threat of reprisals on the subject of the supposed intention of the British Admiralty not to accord to officers and crews of German submarines who have become prisoners the treatment due to them as prisoners of war, especially not to concede to the officers the advantage of their rank. To this communication, which was forwarded by the American Ambassador, Sir Edward Grey has sent a firm reply in the following terms:—

The Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs presents his compliments to the United States Ambassador, and with reference to his Excellency's note of the 20th ultimo respecting reports in the Press upon the treatment of prisoners from German submarines, has the honour to state that he learns from the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty that the officers and men who were rescued from the German submarines U 8 and U 12 have been placed in the Naval Detention Barracks in view of the necessity of their segregation from other prisoners of war. In these quarters they are treated with humanity, given opportunities for exercise, provided with German books, subjected to no forced labour, and are better fed and clothed than British prisoners of equal rank now in Germany. As, however, the crews of the two German submarines in question, before they were rescued from the sea, were engaged in sinking innocent British and neutral merchant ships and wantonly killing non-combatants, they cannot be regarded as honourable opponents, but rather as persons who at the orders of their Government have committed acts which are offences against the law of nations and contrary to common humanity.

His Majesty's Government would also bring to the notice of the United States Government that during the present war more than 1,000 officers and men of the German Navy have been rescued from the sea, sometimes in spite of danger to the rescuers, and sometimes to the prejudice of British naval operations. No case has, however, occurred of any officer or man of the Royal Navy being rescued by the Germans.

AN interview with Lord Haldane which appeared in The Chicago Daily News has been transferred to the English press. In some aspects it may be regarded as one of the important documents of the war, for Lord Haldane has been in closer touch with men of affairs in Germany, and has a more intimate knowledge of the German spirit, than any other English statesman. He explains in some detail the object of his visit to Berlin in 1912, when he saw the Kaiser and talked with many important men, apparently with little good result, for he came away uneasy. "Germany was piling up armaments. She showed no disposition to restrict her naval development."

When I was in Berlin in 1912 [he says] I left no doubt in the minds of the foremost men there of England's pacific purposes and sentiments with reference to Germany. We were prepared, and we definitely told them we were prepared, to enter into the most binding agreement that in no circumstances would we be a party to any sort of aggression against Germany.

Moreover, I did my utmost to make the Berlin statesmen understand England's position. I disabused their minds, if unmistakable language could do it, of all doubt as to what would be England's attitude to a violation of Belgian neutrality. If the Germans ever misunderstood me on this point they have only themselves to thank. From what I said to Bethmann-Hollweg in so many words there ought to have been no doubt in his mind that we should regard an invasion of Belgium as something over which he could not reckon on our neutrality.

I also told him that as long as Germany chose to continue her policy of formidable naval development we should lay down two keels to her one. There was absolutely no ambiguity in my conversation with the German Chancellor, and he understood that all I said on these matters represented the view of the British Government,

At the close of the interview Lord Haldane expressed an emphatic opinion that even if Germany had respected Belgium's neutrality we could not possibly have stood aloof from the war.

Belgium touched our honour; France touched our feelings and our interests. Having regard to the theories of world conquest behind the successful German movement in favour of a war of aggression, it seems to me it would have been madness on our part to have sat with hands folded while Germany removed the Continental obstacles in the way of her laying siege to the British Empire. In the best of circumstances, we are very near the striking power of Germany. I do not think we possibly could have permitted that striking power to come still nearer and absorb the States nearest to us without a desperate attempt to prevent it.

With this clear statement of the case we are in close agreement. The question of Belgium united our people instantly. About a war of self-defence there would have been some hesitation and delay. But we could not have refused it without turning traitor to all the interests of freedom and civilisation which are committed to our care.

* * *

It is these wider aspects of the situation, the reality of the German threat, its deliberate policy of aggression, which make it so futile to persist in laying the chief blame for the outbreak of hostilities upon our diplomatists; or to cry out for peace at a moment when peace would not serve the interests of any good cause. This temper was exhibited in an extreme form at the meeting of the Independent Labour Party in Norwich this week, and reduced the whole proceedings to the level of feeble platitude. One delegate had the courage and the common sense to rebuke the spirit which mistakes anti-nationalism for internationalism, and imagines that to abuse one's own country is to advance the cause of peace. Amid all our tangled discussions about diplomacy and past events we can never get away from the one plain fact, which governs the whole situation, that we are face to face with the war-maker, who has not muddled his way into hostilities, but has planned them deliberately for many years.

THE BISHOP OF ZANZIBAR does not shine in controversy. He mistakes vehement dogmatism for reasonable conviction and angry passion for strength. Except in the narrowest ecclesiastical circles he had contrived to produce a mood of listless weariness about the Kikuyu controversy before the war broke out. Now, in spite of the pre-occupation of the whole country with matters of much graver import, he has returned to the fray, with a bad-mannered attack on the Bishop of Hereford for his preferment of the Rev. B. H. Streeter to a canonry in his cathedral. The declaration, which he has addressed "To the faithful of the diocese of Zanzibar," concludes with the following threat, which is really quite funny in its pontifical grandeur, and savours more of the heroics of melodrama than of real life:—

"Therefore do we, Frank, Lord Bishop of Zanzibar, hereby declare and pronounce that so long as the ground of our complaint set forth above remains there can be and from this day forward there is no communion in sacred things between ourselves and the Right Rev. John, Lord Bishop of Hereford, nor between ourselves and any priest within his jurisdiction who shall make known his approval to the false doctrines now officially authorised within the diocese of Hereford."

THIS extraordinary exhibition of bad taste and bad religion might well have been treated by the Bishop of Hereford with silent contempt. But he has chosen to reply to it with a calmness and dignity which make his rebuke all the more crushing:—

I regret the pain it must have caused you [he writes] to adopt the course you have felt it your duty to adopt, and I freely acknowledge the excellence of your motives, and this leads me to regret all the more your lack of Christian sympathy, your apparent inability even to understand the position of those from whom you differ, and your misguided conception of your own position and of your duty.

For one Bishop to take upon himself to excommunicate another Bishop on his own sole authority because of an alleged misuse of the patronage in his diocese is a proceeding which it is not easy to justify, and which certainly does not tend to edification. And I must confess to some surprise that your natural modesty did not suggest to you that if public action was called for it should have been left to the proper authority.

After a brief reference to Canon Streeter's writings, described as "positive and constructive in aim and character," the Bishop concludes as follows:—

Of your earnestness in the work of the mission field I desire to speak with all respect, and I pray that it may be rightly guided, trusting that in future you will abstain from rash and ill-considered denunciation of your fellow-Churchmen, and concentrate yourself entirely upon that work in happy and fruitful service of our common Lord. In this distressful time we ought surely to rise above our unhappy ecclesiastical divisions and pray for more of the spirit of unity in Christ, and more of brotherhood among men.

EASTER IN THE BELGIAN HOSPITALS.

It was due to our readers that we should go to see for ourselves how their bountiful gifts have been bestowed, and the measure of relief which they have brought to a crushing need. We wanted to see the work in France at close quarters, to look into the faces of those suffering men, and to learn by personal observation and inquiry what we ought to do in the coming weeks. Our object has been achieved. We have been able to visit about twenty hospitals, to talk with the doctors, and to hear from their own lips what they still need in equipment and supplies. Everywhere there has been a great improvement, and there are now a few of these military hospitals which reach a fair level of efficiency. They are at least well served and moderately convenient. But the majority are still in great need of help, and carry on their work under conditions of extraordinary difficulty. They are housed in unsuitable buildings, and many of their arrangements strike the observer as falling far below the standard which we consider essential for the health and comfort of our own men.

There are, for instance, two hospitals housed in places of worship. The beds are crowded together, ventilation is difficult, and privacy for cases of serious illness impossible. Another occupies one floor in a lace factory. The shaft of the machinery stretches right across the largest ward, and makes an incessant noise. The doctor said that the patients did not mind. Perhaps in their dreams it seemed like the music of heaven after the trenches. Another hospital occupies an elementary school. The class-rooms opening one out of another are fairly suitable for wards. Half the beds are of a good type—they have been supplied by our Fund. The rest are rough plank beds, hard and unsanitary. These we must replace as soon as possible. In these surroundings a specialist, the head of a Belgian asylum, looks after the soldiers who are nervously afflicted. He has been wonderfully successful. Men suffering from delusions have become sane, the dumb have recovered their speech, and in a large percentage of cases a complete cure has been effected. A visit to the rooms which have been set apart for officers and men by the Franciscan Sisters revealed the fact that they had given up their own large dormitory. It was impossible to pity them, they looked so happy in their sacrifice of their own spare comforts. As one of them said: "We ought to do an act of penitence on account of the war." But, unfortunately, the beds of these gracious ladies are very short. No man of ordinary stature can lie comfortably in them. They were overjoyed at the suggestion that English friends might be able to supply beds which would give greater ease to their patients.

And so we might go on from one moving incident to another. But we must leave these details to be described by Mrs. Allen in the article which she will contribute next week. For the moment we are anxious to gather up a few general impressions. And, firstly, it is only right that we should make it quite clear, not in any spirit of boasting, but with deep thankfulness, that our Fund has done a great deal of good. Apart from the warm clothing and other physical comforts which we have sent out in large quantities, we have received numerous requisitions from doctors for instruments and special appliances, without which much of their labour must have been in vain. Many of these things we have been able to supply, and they were pointed out to us with a gratitude which touched us deeply, it was so earnest and sincere. Wherever we went we were greeted with delightful friendliness, and at parting were saluted as benefactors. Some of that feeling we want to pass on to our readers. It meant much that an English lady had come to visit their sick. But behind it all was the larger feeling of national obligation. How often it was said to us: "Belgium will never forget what England has done for her." If some international ties have been strained to the breaking-point by the war, others have been forged by the sufferings which we have to bear together, and they are strong as steel.

Another impression of our visit is one of boundless admiration—the expression is not a bit too strong—for the Belgian doctors who are serving in these hospitals. Some of them are quite young, others are men of mature age and experience; but they are all carrying on their difficult work with simple modesty and magnificent courage. Let it be remembered that they are exiles from their own country, cut off from all the varied interests and the lucrative rewards of their profession. Many of them have been prisoners of war in Germany. They carry the memory of bitter wrong in their hearts. They are tortured by daily anxieties for their families and all whom they hold dear. And yet they are cheerful and patient, and tend their sick, as though nothing else mattered in the world. We heard no word of grumbling or complaint at the hardness of their lot; though the longing to be back in their own country broke through the quiet courtesy of their manner, and gave a touch of deep human feeling to our short intercourse with them.

But what shall we say of this long procession of broken and suffering men, the patients for whom these hospitals exist? They lie quietly in bed, or they stand at attention, as we wander through the wards. Some of them are mere boys with bright faces; others are bearded men, already married and with children of their own; but who can tell them where these loved ones are? Many of them are peasants, with deep suffering in the wide-open eyes. It is one thing to read about the war in the newspapers, or to visit a well-equipped hospital where science and sanitation and modern standards of comfort have hidden the horror out of sight. But here it is all so primitive and terrible. It is the dumb agony of a nation, which has been ravaged and crucified, though it had done no wrong. We have looked into the black heart of a crime which can never be forgotten.

One afternoon we visited the Little Sisters of the Poor. The dear women clustered round us and almost crooned over us with delight. They showed us over their wards and took a special pride in pointing out the beds and other things which we had sent to help them in their work. Then they took us into a small room where a haggard man lay. Clearly he was dying. They told us his story. The Germans had shot his son. Then he went into the army that he might avenge the deed. He had been wounded; his wife was dead; he had lost all he had in the world, and was sent here—to this home of mercy in a strange land—to die. One of us spoke a few words to him. He mumbled a little. Then he raised himself in bed and cursed Germany with an exceeding bitter curse, and sank back exhausted on his pillow. A little later the Mother Superior and the Abbé gave us tea in a small parlour. Above our heads was the motto “Que la vérité soit toujours sur nos lèvres et la charité dans nos cœurs.” It was the eve of Easter Day. It is not by fine words that we shall conquer cruelty and hate and usher in the reign of Christ, but by sharing his redemptive life, by doing justly and loving mercy and giving up ourselves to the service of those who suffer wrong, that we may comfort their sorrow, and heal their sickness, and bring them again to their own land in peace.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

THEN said Great-heart to Mr. Valiant-for-Truth, Thou hast worthily behaved thyself. Let me see thy Sword. So he showed it him. When he had taken it in his hand, and looked thereon a while, he said, Ha, it is a right Jerusalem Blade!—The Pilgrim's Progress.

THE TREATMENT OF ENEMIES.

NATIONAL benevolence prevailed over national animosity; their prisoners were, indeed, enemies, but they were enemies in distress; they ceased to be hateful when they no longer continued to be formidable; forgetting, therefore, their natural hatred, the men who were brave enough to conquer were generous enough to forgive; and they, whom all the world seemed to have disclaimed, at last found pity and redress from those they attempted to subdue. A subscription was opened, ample charities collected, proper necessities secured, and the poor gay sons of a merry nation were once more taught to resume their former gaiety

...I own I cannot look over this catalogue of good men and philosophers without thinking better of myself, because it makes me entertain a more favourable opinion of mankind; I am particularly struck with one who writes these words upon the paper that enclosed his benefaction: The mite of an Englishman, a citizen of the world, to Frenchmen, prisoners of war, and naked. I only wish that he may find as much pleasure from his virtues, as I have done in reflecting upon them; that alone will amply reward him. Such a one, my friend, is an honour to human nature; he makes no private distinctions of party; all that are stamped with the divine image of their Creator are friends to him; he is a native of the world; and the Emperor of China may be proud that he has such a countryman. To rejoice at the destruction of our enemies is a foible grafted upon human nature, and we must be permitted to indulge it; the true way of atoning for such an ill-founded pleasure is thus to turn our triumph into an act of benevolence, and to testify our own joy by endeavouring to banish anxiety from others.—From 'The Citizen of the World,' by Oliver Goldsmith.

A PRAYER AT TWILIGHT.

THOU who holdest our souls in life and sufferest not our feet to be moved, as the night draws on and one by one the tasks of the day are laid aside, and the busy distractions of the day cease, and the noises of the day fall into silence, we are brought back to that which endures, that from which no accident can separate us, the deep realities of life in which our souls are held by Thee—the Love which abides amid the things that change and pass, the Voice that speaks to us forever above the tumult of conflicting tongues, the Peace that passeth understanding and seeks us out when we are weary with our own troubled thoughts. In this assurance of the Invisible and the eternal at the heart of the visible and temporal, send us to our rest, that from our rest we may arise fresh and strong to perform the duties and overcome the difficulties of a new day, as becometh disciples of Him whose joy it was to do and to suffer Thy holy will. AMEN.

QUESTIONS AT ISSUE.

THE VALUE OF NATIONALITY.

BY H. G. CHANCELLOR, M.P.

ONE of the strongest passions of human nature is the love of one's native place. From time to time in the world's history migrations take place of whole peoples. And during the past three centuries, since the discovery of the New World, a constant and increasing stream of emigration has gone on from the crowded countries of Europe, settling with a strange, new and mixed population the unfilled spaces of America, Africa, and Australia. But the first generation of settlers always take with them memories of childhood and home; and however humble it may have been, however filled with trouble or persecution, whether the home be Ireland or Russia, and whatever the motive for leaving it, whether economic necessity or eviction, or merely love of adventure and demand for scope and enterprise, the heart clings to the old country and the old home. Nothing else can quite fill its place. Prosperity and success cannot obliterate it. In time the new country becomes a second home. Business interests and domestic ties come to fill the mind and heart. But they do not take the place of the old country and the first home. From the ends of the earth the call of home brings yearly not only to the towns and villages of our own land, but to those of Germany and even the Balkan States, thousands who left them penniless and have found fortune and success in newer lands across the seas.

These visits are not those of the globe trotter. They are not to satisfy curiosity, or for purposes of study or adventure or financial gain or economic advantage such as animated the leaving in the first place. They are to satisfy the heart-hunger for home, to revive the memory of the joys and sorrows of early life, to renew the old associations, to see again the old friends, or learn what has become of them.

Of course, to the next generation the new country is home. Its people and its institutions enter into their life and become part of their very being. Its language—strange, probably, to the parents—becomes the native tongue of the children. The same associations that draw the hearts of the old folk to the homes of their childhood tie the young ones to the new country. It is wonderful how soon the bewildering variety of races and languages that in the last hundred years has been pouring into the United States lose their old characteristics, and blend and amalgamate into one people with one language. In two, or at most three generations, Englishman, Italian, German, Spaniard, Irishman, Albanian, Pole develops into the good American—a new race, with a love and devotion to the new country as deep and united as that of the first generation to their native lands, which were divided and often hostile.

"A country of their own." It is a feeling independent of possession. It exists in the cottage and the slum as well as in the mansion. The men of the Mayflower had little cause for gratitude to England. They had been deprived by her of something dearer to them than life, the right to worship God according to their own conscience. This had driven them to Holland. Their adopted country had given them the freedom their native land had denied. But she could not fill its place. The old associations, language, habits of life and thought could not be transplanted to Holland. Their children, if they remained at Leyden, would lose their nationality. And so, grateful though they were for the freedom and hospitality of Holland, for the sake of the children they must leave her. Denied the rights they claimed in England, they braved the ocean's perils in their little ship, and planted across the Atlantic a New England, where their language and nationality could be preserved, and their consciences satisfied at the same time. They planted Massachusetts with settlements to which they gave the names of the towns and villages of their native land—Boston, Lynn, Taunton, &c.—and reproduced as nearly as they could the institutions of their native land. Love of freedom alone would have kept them in Holland. Love of freedom and of England, with all that England meant to them, drove them to the peril and hardship of New England. They had no thought of founding a new nation. Political severance was to them unthinkable. That became possible only a century and a half later, to a generation to whom their old associations had become not experience, but history.

They were "seeking a country of their own," but that country was their own England. They took their nationality with them. That was too precious to lose. When the new nation was formed it became to their successors what the old country had been to the Pilgrim Fathers, demanding and receiving the same allegiance and devotion. The revolution that tore New England from Old England was as real an expression of nationality as that which had attached the old name to the new country.

What is this sentiment of nationality but an enlarged and ennobled expression of family life? The purest and most binding relationship between human beings is that of marriage. The ideal marriage is the blending of two lives into one, each party being the complement of the other, each sharing with the other their fullest life—physical, domestic, mental, and spiritual.

Next come the relations of parent and children. It is natural and proper that, however large a man's heart, its warmest corner should be reserved for those of his own kindred. These demand his first care. They depend on him for their very life. Indeed, they have derived their life from his. And even when children have gone forth to lead an independent life the hallowed associations of home tie them to him with invisible bonds stronger than links of iron. When there is need they return out of their own store some of the help he gave in their childhood.

But though blood relations have first call on our affection, it extends far beyond the family, first to neighbours, inhabitants of the same town or village, and to the local community itself, then to the larger units, until it reaches the state or nation. Nationality is the sense of brotherhood, the feeling that the nation as a community has a call on one's affection that takes precedence over all others, because fellow-citizens are more closely related to each other than to the citizens of other states. In times of danger the claims of this larger family became paramount, demanding and receiving sacrifice of means, service, life itself. That has been remarkably demonstrated in the wide response to the call for defenders in the frightful war that threatens the very existence of our people. Patriotism is altogether a noble sentiment. Would that it was as keenly felt in times of peace, and found expression in the less exciting duties of citizenship. There is no time when love of country and devotion to her service are not called for, in the humdrum duties of the local administrative body as well as the wider sphere of national politics. If right and justice are to be established and maintained they must be the fruit of an educated mind, an enlightened heart, and a quickened conscience. And each citizen has his own part to play in developing these, first in his own character, and then in his influence on others. The true patriot will not wait to serve his country until the sword is drawn. He will serve her all the time. He will not be content merely to receive the benefits of ordered Government, nor even merely to pay the rates and taxes he cannot avoid. He will strive to understand and to improve, and to select the best legislators and administrators for local and national affairs. And when he realises that he has powers and gifts that can be used in public service he will offer them, not for popularity or fame or reward of any kind, but for the benefit of his fellow-citizens. It is because this true patriotism, this sense of obligation to the community in humble ways and unexcited times requires the stimulus of war, or calamity, or national peril to bring it out, that public affairs so often come under the control of self-seekers, to the loss and detriment of the community.

Now, is the sense of nationality inconsistent with that wider brotherhood that Christ preached? In other words, need it be exclusive of other nations? Can a man love his own country and love all mankind too? The idea that he cannot is a pernicious perversion of the truth that has caused the distrust and jealousy and hatred that bring about war.

Bernhardi, the German general, whose book 'Germany and the Next War' has been so widely read, expresses a feeling only too common in all countries. He says (p. 29): "Christian morality is based on the law of love.... This law can claim no significance for the relations of one country to another, since its application to politics would lead to a conflict of duties. The love which a man showed to another country as such would imply a want of love for his own countrymen." According to this exponent of Christianity, therefore, the brotherhood of Englishmen is right, the brotherhood of Germans is right, but the brotherhood of man is wrong. When Jesus gave as an example of neighbourliness the binding up of the wounds of a robbed and outraged Jew by a Samaritan, a member of a people with whom the Jews had no dealings, he made a mistake. Instead of rescuing and restoring him he should have murdered him, because the love shown to a Jew implied "a want of love for his own countrymen," whom Jews hated. It is not only a lie, but a blasphemous lie, which leads straight to Bernhardi's conclusion, "according to Christianity we cannot disapprove of war, but must admit that it is justified morally and historically" (p. 29). In the realm of private relations between citizens of the same country love is to rule. Might is not right. But in that of international relations "Might gives the right to occupy and conquer. Might is at once the supreme right, and the dispute as to what is right is decided by the arbitrament of war." There can, then, be no brotherhood of man, no brotherhood of nations. The duty of one nation when it acquires the necessary power is to conquer its neighbour, to confiscate its territory, to murder its people, and to destroy its nationality. The just man is the one who refuses to use his power to injure his neighbour. The just nation is the one which uses its power to rob and despoil its neighbour. Bill Sikes is its ideal. That is the "righteousness that exalteth a nation." The theological general declares that "the end all and be all of a state is power."

There you have the spirit that too often vitiates patriotism and turns it from a great and ennobling ideal into a curse to the human race, blighting its happiness, destroying its prosperity, and turning progress into reaction and civilisation into savagery. Is this spirit a necessary part of patriotism? If so, patriotism is the negation of Christianity, or, indeed, of any religion based on the Fatherhood of God. If nationality confines brotherhood by political boundaries and makes hatred towards other nations a duty, then patriotism is wrong, or the Fatherhood of God, which involves brotherhood between all members of his family, is a fraud and a delusion.

But are the two ideals necessarily hostile or mutually exclusive? No more so than that love of one's own family excludes love of fellow-countrymen who belong to other families. The fact that the one is more intense and the other less does not prevent both feelings from dwelling in the same breast, as even the bloodthirsty general would admit. The man who loves his family and his nation is a bigger-hearted and a better man than he who has room for one or the other only.

In the same way the man who, loving his own nation, wishes well to all other nations is nobler and more Christian than he who loves his own nation alone. For there is a real brotherhood of nations as well as of individuals and families. And it consists largely in the same things. One of the strongest bonds of the family is the mutual dependence of its members. The sick or delicate child twines itself around the hearts of parents, brothers, and sisters more than the child which can fend for itself. It receives without claiming the tender care and help which it needs. Its very need constitutes a right to such help, a right that is ungrudgingly recognised.

In the same way nations are interdependent, and the very weakness of a weaker nation constitutes a right to the protection and assistance of its stronger neighbour, which has no greater right to use its power to destroy it than has the strong brother to dash out the brains of the weak and ailing and dependent member of his family.

Nations pride themselves on their independence. There is no such thing as an independent nation, and as the world develops that will become more and more evident. Take our own country. England is politically as independent as any nation ever was or ever can be. But she is linked with all the peoples on the planet in financial and commercial bonds that make her prosperity and happiness dependent on their prosperity and well-being. The more they prosper the more they help our prosperity. That is true even of the peoples with whom we are now at war. Germany, by her achievements in science and philosophy and poetry, has enriched the pockets and the moral and spiritual life of England. Her very competition with us in the world's markets has stimulated our own enterprise and progress. And she has been for years one of the largest buyers from and sellers to us. The exchange of the things we want from her for the things she wants from us has contributed largely to the prosperity of both. The more Germany has prospered the more able has she been to buy from us the goods we could best produce, and to produce and supply in payment those we most wanted from her. The cessation of the trade between these two nations injures both, and even if we capture her trade in neutral markets where we have been in competition it will not repair the injury. Certain individuals and trades will benefit, but the nation as a whole will suffer.

The fact is that, in the very nature of things, nations—even competing nations—are co-operators in one another's well-being. The idea that they are hostile of necessity is a relic of superstition inherited from barbarism, which is being disproved by every invention, every development of transit or communication, every fresh industry that furnishes a human need or convenience, and makes it available to the peoples of the world.

Each nation has its own contribution to make to human thought and human progress, and its own need for the contributions of other nations. Their natural relations are those of the family. Enmity, fear, hatred are the products of ignorance and greed, fostered and magnified by interested classes.

The greatest contribution to the world's religion came from a small and despised nation—the Jews; the greatest contribution to philosophic thought from the little states and cities of Greece; the rebirth of learning in Europe from Italy when she was split up into numerous small and politically independent principalities and cities. Holland, when fighting Spain for her very existence, gave Europe the great lead in civil and religious liberty. The recognition of nationality and of local patriotism and autonomy has made the British Empire, not an Empire in the old sense, but a federation of free states, each one developing on its own lines, and gladly making its contribution to the good of the whole. Switzerland has given the world great lessons in freedom and democratic government. Norway has nearly solved the drink problem.

The individuality of states is as real as that of individuals, and the destruction of that individuality is as criminal as the murder of individuals. The substitution of power for justice, whereby great states tyrannise over small ones, injures the whole human race, by depriving it of their individual contributions to human knowledge and experience.

It is the natural God-given right of every human being to have "a country of his own," and his duty to love and serve that country. Conquest, the suppression of nationality, has just as much and just as little moral justification as burglary with murder added. If justice is ever to rule the world power must be dethroned, and national rights permanently secured by international guarantee—in other words, by international law; and the violator of national right must be treated as a pariah and outcast among the nations until amendment is made for the wrong inflicted. The good citizen, who wishes for his country real greatness, will recognise that this must be based, not on bigness, but on righteousness. He will recognise that her ambitions must be limited by the rights of other states, and that any use of her power to override those rights will tarnish her real greatness, just as robbery and oppression dishonour the individual who is guilty of these crimes.

In the development of such patriotism lies the hope of moralising international politics, of substituting love and straight-dealing for hate and deception, of conducting the affairs of nations on the principles of the Sermon on the Mount, of making human brotherhood both real and world-wide, of creating at last a Christian world, if not in creed, at any rate in spirit, and thus of ushering in the Kingdom of God.

THE EXPEDITION TO GERMAN SOUTH-WEST AFRICA.

SIR,—In my last 'South Africa Notes' I stated that the message of the Imperial Government to the Union Government on the above matter (according to responsible politicians in all parties) ran, in substance, as follows: "Occupy German South-West Africa. If you don't we shall use Indian troops for the purpose." The official correspondence has now been published, and I find that the Imperial Government sent no such message. It was apparently universally believed, with the variation that possibly Australian troops would be used; the argument was used in the Press and in political speeches, and it undoubtedly helped to sway the minds of many people into agreeing to the expedition. It is satisfactory to find that the Imperial authorities were much more wise and cautious in their suggestions about German South-West Africa than was supposed. The responsibility for the expedition, therefore, lies with the Union Government. I am afraid the methods of secret diplomacy and the withholding of State documents from the public are answerable for the false supposition.—Yours, &c. R. BALMFORTH.

Cape Town, March 18, 1915.

[We are glad to publish Mr. Balmforth's correction. The original statement, which struck us at the time as improbable, appeared entirely on Mr. Balmforth's authority. May we suggest that the last sentence in his letter is a little unfortunate. So far from observing "the methods of secret diplomacy," the Government has published the documents with commendable promptness, probably at the earliest moment consistent with the public interest.—Ed. of INQUIRER.]

FOR THE CHILDREN.

THE RIVER GRETA IN APRIL.

IN Cumberland valleys many a tall sycamore grows near the rivers, and is always the first tree to be clothed in green. Its light green buds are swelling fast, and the broad leaves will open out in a few days. The yellowish green flowers will very soon follow. I want none of you who live where sycamores grow to miss the beauty of these flowers. They hang so modestly under the leaves that, like violets, they are easily overlooked. Notice them particularly at the end of April, when they will be hanging like bunches of white grapes. Not that the blossoms are like berries; but when the low sun shines on them they have the lovely transparent colour of what we call white grapes, although they are really green.

April 3.—This afternoon the Greta is in spate. That means that a heavy rainfall has swollen it far beyond its usual height. The water rushes along, carrying balls of foam from the weir, and brown sticks picked up by the mountain becks as they gathered force and swept all sorts of loose trifles with them towards the river. Yesterday the river ran clear; you could see the trout if you leaned over the parapet of the bridge, and the alder catkins that dropped, over-ripe, from the trees bending over the water were carried gently down stream floating on the surface. To-day the water is brown with the particles of soil that it is carrying seaward. A mass of rushing water has great carrying power, and pushing power too. When the Greta is in spate it rolls large stones along its floor. Sometimes it crashes two boulders against one another with such force that one is split in two. The two halves of such a boulder lie before me in the Greta as I write. They were one stone, big enough to fill a large wheelbarrow a month ago. Further up the Greta there are natural basins or "pot-holes," as they are called, hollowed by the action of water on the rocky bed of the river.

A fortnight ago the rooks in the tree-tops were making much noise. Nest building was going on energetically. I stood on the river bank and watched the rooks break twigs off the ends of the branches and carry them to the half-made nests. Some disputing and fighting went on; the loud "Caw, caw, caw," never ceased for one moment. Now the scene is very different. The hubbub is over. Nearly all the nests are finished, and in many there are eggs. Look carefully and you will make out the black tail of a sitting bird projecting over the nest edge. The father bird is often seen sitting on a bough very near the nest. From time to time he flies off to find food for himself and to take to his mate whom he feeds on the nest. We shall not need to climb the trees and look into the nests to know whether the eggs have hatched out. When that time comes we shall see both parents going busily to and fro with food, and before long we shall be told by a new and weak, but very constant "caw, caw," that the young rooks are lively and are croaking to the parents as they bring them grubs, wireworms, cockchafers, and other dainties.

People who are near the river where it flows through a wood may sometimes see a squirrel come to the edge to drink. If one of these nimble little creatures wishes to cross the Greta and feed or romp in the part of the wood on the further side, it will look for a large tree that stretches its branches far across towards a similar tree on the other bank. The squirrel will then make its way nearly to the end of such a far-stretching branch, and, leaping several feet, will land safely in a rather lower branch of the opposite tree. I have never seen a squirrel leap upwards when making its way across a considerable space. The downward leap is easier. The other day I saw a squirrel sitting on a larch bough high up in the tree. He sat quite still for a long while. As I wished to note the condition of his coat I wanted him to move, so went to the tree and tapped the trunk once or twice with a stick. When I looked up again the squirrel had gone from the bough, and I could not find him for ever so long. At last, when I was no longer searching for him, I noticed a sort of bulge on one side of the trunk of the tree, near the top. Had I not known that no such bulge was there five minutes before, I should have been slow to suspect what was the truth, that the squirrel had made itself very flat, and had pressed its body and limbs, also its tail, against the tree trunk in order to conceal itself. Its hind feet rested on different boughs, and its forepaws were stretched upwards, so that it seemed to stand flat up against the tree trunk. It was a very clever piece of concealment.

The pair of dippers which we call ours because they so often feed in front of the house, have begun a nest within thirty yards of our windows. The last three days we have seen them carrying nesting material towards a certain spot; but the water is too deep for me to get near enough to see just where they go when they disappear behind some trees close to the mill race.

April 6.—The river has so far gone down that I can get to a place where I can just see the dippers enter the conduit which carries the water away from the mill wheel; but I cannot yet get near enough to see in which crevice of the stonework the nest is being made. If the river continues to go down I shall have made my way to the nest before this article is in print. At present the birds are carrying last year's leaves to the nest. They carry each leaf to the water, and, holding it in their bills, dip it several times so as to make the dry leaf pliable. If it is quite dry an old leaf is apt to crumble to pieces when they try to weave it into the nest. On the 4th and 5th they carried nothing but the faded grass stalks they plucked from the bank just opposite. They had to pull very hard sometimes to pluck the stalks one by one. Once I saw one of the birds pull so hard, and dislodge the stalk so suddenly, that it lost its balance, and fell over backwards, rolling down the few inches of sandy bank into the water. The dippers took the grasses in bunches of eight to twenty at a time. If it was not raining they held them in the river first.

It is well known that nest building goes on most in the early hours of a fine day. This is probably because the materials used are then still damp with dew and easier to work with.

Grey wagtails have been with us for three weeks, and are constantly flying up and down the river catching flies. We think one pair is going to nest close by, so we watch carefully when we see these yellow-breasted birds come skimming by, their white-edged tails spread out to act as rudders.

UNION FOR SOCIAL SERVICE.

THE National Conference Union for Social Service is showing fresh activity in the publication of the Social Service Quarterly, the first number of which is issued this month. It contains a suggestive article by the Rev. H. H. Johnson, Secretary of the Union, on 'The Indispensability of Religion for all Effective Social Reform,' in which he points out insistently that the State needs a soul which can only be secured to it through the influence of Christianity. It is announced that the Annual Meeting of the Union will be held at the High Pavement Chapel, Nottingham, on Monday, April 26, when the following resolutions among others will be submitted:—1. That the name of the Union be henceforth "The Liberal Christian Union for Social Service." 2. That the object of the Union be henceforth "To further the application of Liberal Christian principles to all questions of social reform, and to develop the consciousness of social responsibility among members of Liberal Christian Churches by pressing upon them (a) careful study of the social problems of modern civilisation; (b) the undertaking of definite practical work toward their solution; (c) the recognition of a common ground of Christian witness and of Christian service; and (d) co-operation with other religious and social organisations working for human betterment."

The programme of the Swanwick Summer School, in which the Union will as usual take part (to be held from June 26 to July 5), is of exceptional interest owing to the importance of the subjects to be discussed in the light of the present crisis. The speakers include Mr. A. Clutton Brock, the Bishop of Oxford, Monsignor Parkinson, Mr. G. P. Gooch, the Rev. Richard Roberts, Mr. Norman Angell, Miss Maude Royden, Mr. J. St. G. Heath, the Rev. W. Temple, and the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas. Mr. Clutton Brock will speak on 'International Life and the Kingdom of God,' the Rev. W. Temple on 'The Contribution to be Made by the Democratic Movement to International Peace,' and Mr. J. St. G. Heath on 'The Education of Public Opinion.' The Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas will urge that Christianity permits war at a stage of the world's development; while the Rev. Richard Roberts will maintain the opposite view that Christianity condemns all war. Mr. Norman Angell will speak on 'World Resources and National Needs: the Economic Unity of Civilisation'; while it will fall to Miss Royden's lot to discuss 'The Contribution of the Women's Movement.' It is hoped that there will be a good attendance.

THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

IN the course of the report read at the Council Meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association on March 30 interesting details of the work of the Van Mission and Pioneer Preachers were given.

THE VAN MISSION.

The ninth season of the Van Mission opened with the brightest prospects, and for the first time in two or three years there were sufficient offers of ministerial help to enable the programme to be carried through without undue demands upon the help of a few willing helpers. Up to the time when the war broke out the work was admirably done, and fifty thousand people attended the 250 meetings in London, in Lancashire and North Wales, in Lincolnshire and Yorkshire, and in South-East Wales. At Tredegar, in South-East Wales, regular Sunday services have been held since the prolonged visit of the Mission, and though the troubles of the moment have, no doubt, interfered with the success of the work, the South-East Wales Society has taken steps to help the effort regularly. The war has interfered with several promising efforts in the Yorkshire district and elsewhere, and in view of the national crisis it was thought wise to discontinue the Mission for a time. The Vans were accordingly placed at the disposal of the Red Cross Society. They have not yet been required, but the offer has been gratefully acknowledged, and they will be kept in reserve for future need. The Missionary Agent has been indefatigable in his efforts, and in the course of fifteen weeks' absence from London it is interesting to note that he travelled a distance of over 12,000 miles.

THE PIONEER PREACHERS.

Further developments have taken place during the year in the Pioneer Preachers' Movement. In May the new hostel at 23, Highbury Place, was opened, and during the greater part of the year seven Pioneers have been in residence. The men have studied under the direction of the Revs. William Wooding, W. D. Robson, A. H. Biggs, and J. A. Pearson, while the Missionary Agent of the Association has acted as Superintendent and Secretary. The new men admitted during 1914 were Messrs. John Begg and Sydney Franklin, and the Committee during the last month have admitted for a probationary period of three months Messrs. Joseph Rosling, William Wake, and F. A. Anthony—the last mentioned a native of Sherbra, Sierre Leone, who wishes to qualify for missionary work in his own land. There are thus ten Pioneers at the present time in addition to Misses Knight and Seymour, the Sisters, whose work in the East End of London has been successfully carried on during the year. The Pioneers have conducted 509 Sunday services and 159 Sunday school services; 1,044 weekday meetings, as well as 118 open-air meetings; they have also paid 1,660 congregational visits and 312 National Relief visits. The Misses Knight and Seymour, in addition to their church and relief visits, have held 383 weekday meetings and 87 Sunday school meetings, and conducted ten Sunday services. The earnings of the Preachers and the Sisters amounted to £618, including expenses repaid; subscriptions of £196 were also received, and the loss on the year's working is £29.

MANCHESTER DISTRICT SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

RESOLUTION ON WAR.

THE Seventieth Annual Meeting of the Manchester District Sunday School Association was held on Good Friday at Brookfield Church, Gorton. In the forenoon service was held in the Church, at which the preacher was the Rev. J. J. Wright.

In the afternoon the business meeting was held, the Rev. J. Morley Mills (Dob Lane, Failsworth) in the chair.

The Report of the General Committee stated that 610 teachers and scholars had absented themselves from the schools on account of military service.

The Chairman, who moved the adoption of the Report, said they were hopeful that more temperance work would be done in the future than had been done in the past. He trusted that every Sunday School teacher would follow the lead of the King and—at least, until the war was over—impress his example upon the children. Sunday School teachers were faced with very great and increasing difficulties in the working of their schools owing to the school ranks being depleted by those who had enlisted. He knew of a school with an honours list of over eighty, and of other schools which had lost heavily in numbers. In view of the young men who had enlisted in the service of their country, there was a call to the older men to come back to the work, and to take the places of those who had gone, and fill them until their return. After the war was over there should be no hatred of the German, but there should be cultivated in the children the higher ideals of a love of universal peace.

Mr. H. J. Broadbent seconded the motion, which was passed.

The officers and Committee were afterwards elected, with the Rev. J. Morley Mills as President.

The Rev. A. Lewis proposed the following resolution:—"That this meeting of the Manchester District Sunday School Association, believing that a homicidal war is a most serious obstacle to the cultivation of morality and true religion, and therefore of all these Sunday Schools are intended to promote, and that it is destructive of the brotherhood of man, hereby records its opinion that it is most urgently desirable that peace shall be established between the nations upon the most enduring foundations."

The Rev. H. Bodell Smith (Hon. Secretary) seconded the resolution.

The Rev. J. Evans (Rochdale) said that while he was heartily in favour of peace, he felt that he could not vote for the resolution, as far as he had heard it, because he was afraid, if carried, it would be misinterpreted even by their own young men. They recorded the fact that so many of their young men had gone to the war, and they were proud that they had gone to sacrifice their lives if necessary for their country, and now they proposed a resolution, the terms of which might be taken as not quite approving of their action.

The Rev. H. Bodell Smith said the resolution expressed no disapproval of their young men going to the war. They had no choice in the matter, but had to take their part. All the same, the meeting was at liberty to say that war was an evil to be avoided if possible.

Another speaker asked whether there could be inserted in the resolution a clause to the effect that the meeting was in favour of the prosecution of the present war?

The Rev. Lawrence Scott said they were afforded an extraordinary opportunity in the passing of the resolution. There could be no possibility of a misunderstanding as to its intention. They were all in favour of peace, but they dreaded Prussianism. Let them by all means do everything they could to prepare during war for peace.

The Rev. H. Bodell Smith said that, with the permission of the mover of the resolution, he would suggest the insertion of the words, "when that peace is made," so that the last clause would read, "It is most desirable, when that peace is made, that it shall be established between the nations upon the most enduring foundations."

This alteration was accepted, and in its amended form the resolution was passed unanimously.

DURING the Sundays in April Dr. Hunter is dealing with the subject of Immortality at the Morning Service at the Æolian Hall, New Bond Street, as follows: Sunday, April 11, 'Heaven—the Fulfilment of the Prophecy of Life'; Sunday, April 18, 'The Thirst for Justice Unsatisfied in the Present Life: the Vindication of the Righteous Beyond Death'; and Sunday, April 25, 'Christ's Interpretation of Life Here and Hereafter. "In My Father's House are many Mansions."' The service begins at 11 o'clock.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Birmingham.—The Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas has sent a Pastoral Letter to the members and friends of the Old Meeting Church, in which, after commenting on the work of the past year, and the atmosphere of sincerity and reverence which pervades the services, he says:—"To-day we live under a heavy cloud, in the midst of the dark sorrows and fierce exultations of war. I have published and spoken so much on this international tragedy that here I will only touch on it. Like a man in sudden overwhelming grief we cannot realise the magnitude of this disaster nor visualise the dreadful woes to come. But we can see some threads of gold in the black pall of our grief. Our Church, like other Churches, has responded to the imperial and imperious call, and offered her sons to what, in my judgment, is the justest war England has ever waged. The sacrifice of our women—mothers, wives, daughters, sisters, sweethearts—is in some ways the purest and most beautiful sacrifice of all. It has been so bravely offered with a renunciation so complete. Every pang of pain has been so nobly hidden or disguised in wistful smiles. God strengthen their quivering hearts and feed them on the day of victory yet to come! Meanwhile let us endeavour so to live that we shall not blush to look back at the thoughts of our hearts during this crisis. Let us pitch our patriotism at the very highest note, that we may be ashamed of nothing, and that our victory may be a victory of spirit as well as of arms. Feel nothing, say nothing, do nothing to disgrace our beloved land. Yield not for a moment to the temptation of boasting, or abuse or vengeance. Try to believe that our strong and cruel enemy, whom through horrors yet unrealised we must decisively vanquish, is some day, after a change of heart, going to be our fast and firm friend. It is a difficult thing to believe that with a belief pure and sincere enough to affect conduct and temper. But it will be possible to believe it when the war is over. Let it be possible to us now. 'We have turned a people of poets and thinkers into a united nation in arms,' said the German Emperor the other day addressing a group of his subjects—as if it were something for praise. Let us rather look to 'the day,' beyond this bitter day, the obliterating, reconciling, glorious day when the German nation now in arms shall be turned again into a people of poets and thinkers, our forgiven and forgiving brethren in Christ, when we and all the nations of the world shall never know war any more, when Right and Might shall be joined in holy wedlock consecrated by the pure love of God."

Chester.—The congregation of Matthew Henry's Chapel has suffered another loss by the death on March 28 of its oldest member, Mrs. Ann Orrett, widow of the late Mr. William Orrett, of Newgate Street, in her 92nd year. Mrs. Orrett had led a strenuous life, and was in full possession of her faculties up to the end. She was a loyal supporter of the congregation and Sunday School, in which she took a keen interest; and her son, Mr. William Orrett, at whose house she died, is the treasurer of the Chapel. The funeral took place on Wednesday, March 31, a short service being held at the Chapel, conducted by the Minister, the Rev. D. Jenkin Evans.

Melbourne.—In January, 1914, the Rev. Wyndham S. Heathcote, B.A., was appointed Minister of the Unitarian Church for twelve months, the time expiring on January 31, 1915. He has now been invited to give his services for another similar term. The success attending Mr. Heathcote's ministry has been very marked. Apart from his pulpit utterances he has attracted much attention by his public lectures on 'Why I Left the Church' and 'Miracles.' The attendance throughout the year has been gratifying, especially with regard to the evening services, and the various Church activities have been maintained successfully.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

FOREIGNERS IN GERMANY.

The German Committee, which is working on the same lines as the Emergency Committee for the assistance of innocent alien enemies in our own country convened by the Society of Friends, has recently published an interim report, giving full details as to the good which is being done by its members in Berlin. Besides the transmission of letters sent through neutral countries, the giving of advice and assistance to foreigners desiring to return to their own land, and practical efforts to improve the conditions of the interned civilians, employment has been obtained for many whose nationality made it almost impossible for them to get work unaided, while full advantage has been taken of every opportunity for religious ministrations. Dr. Elisabeth Rotten, the secretary, who was before the war a lecturer at Newnham College, points out that while, in England, private benevolence plays a much greater part than public relief, in Germany the position is reversed, and the activities of the German Committee have therefore been largely in the direction of making existing organisations for social welfare accessible to those to whom they might otherwise be closed. They are co-operating with many philanthropic and religious societies, also with the British Committee of Relief established in the American Embassy. The latter has recently published a revised edition of the German Committee's original appeal, signed by such well-known friends of the Anglo-German Friendship Movement as Pastor Siegmund-Schultze, Prof. W. Foerster, Dr. Spiecker, and Herr de Neufville.

THE PROBLEM OF WOMEN'S EMPLOYMENT.

In view of the increased demand for women's labour owing to the war, which it is obvious must have far-reaching effects, the pamphlet on 'The War, Women, and Unemployment,' prepared by the Women's Executive Group of the Fabian Society, deserves to be carefully read. It gives some startling facts which have come to light as the result of most careful investigations, and lays great stress on the need for technical education to remedy the present deplorable lack of skill and competence among women workers which the Government is now undertaking to supply where possible. In London, since 1904, trade schools have been established for limited numbers of girls, but outside London such schools hardly exist, and in a big city like Manchester, where a school for dressmaking has been established, there is provision for only twenty-four students. A careful inquiry extending over thousands of cases in practically the whole range of women's occupations showed that about half the women wage-earners canvassed were contributing to the support of children or parents, brothers or sisters, disabled husbands and other relatives, if they were not keeping them entirely.

BELGIAN COOKERY IN ENGLAND.

The idea of taking advantage of the skill of the Belgians in some particular branches of cookery whilst the opportunity exists is responsible for the recent demonstration in Belgian cookery, as taught by the trained teachers of the écoles ménagères, which has recently been given by one of them, a refugee from Antwerp. The cookery of the Belgian woman of the working classes depends largely on the use of vegetables, and it is the palatable vegetable soups and their methods of preparation which the ladies responsible for this experiment are anxious to popularise in England. Classes have already been held at several of the clubs for soldiers' and sailors' wives. Others, for working women, are now being formed in various parts of London, while arrangements are under consideration for similar instruction to be given in the country districts. Applications for teachers should be made to Miss Sylvester Samuel, 50, Onslow Gardens, S.W.

THE RISE IN FOOD PRICES.

No less than 10,000 copies of the little booklet issued by the National Food Reform Association, 'Economical Dishes for Workers,' have been sold since the war began, and a new and revised edition has now been issued. It contains, in addition to a number of excellent recipes, some useful hints on diet and the preparation of food; and in view of the difficulties with which temperance workers are struggling so bravely, we should like to give them a hint which they can pass on to all who will take it, that these economical dishes, besides being fully as strengthening as the far more expensive ones of which meat forms the chief part, reduce the craving for strong drink. Other publications of a similar useful character, which can be obtained from the Association, 178, St. Stephen's House, Westminster, are 'Aids to Fitness,' 1d., and 'Facts for Patriots,' 3d.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.

As we intimated last week Mr. and Mrs. Bernard Allen and the Editor have been able to pay a visit to the North of France to inspect the work of our Belgian Hospital Fund at close quarters. To-day we publish the first of two articles by Mrs. Allen dealing with some of the incidents of the visit more in detail. We are sure that it will be read with absorbing interest. It is a simple and unvarnished tale of some of the tragic realities of the war which will touch many hearts. We hope that it will also stimulate generous gifts to our Fund. Of three things we can speak with the confidence of personal knowledge. First, the distribution of our help is carried out with a promptness and care which are beyond praise. Secondly, our work has been the means of saving a large amount of suffering, and reducing the percentage of mortality in the hospitals. Thirdly, the element of personal sympathy has touched and helped the brave doctors and nurses, and forged another link in international friendship. We were received so cordially because we were English, and represented to them the great heart of England and the Empire in its desire to help them in their sufferings.

THOUGH much has been accomplished let no one suppose that the time has come for any slackening of effort. We came away with a strong conviction of the overwhelming need of going on with our work with all the energy which we can command. We have a better knowledge than before of local conditions, and have observed many fresh wants. Let it be remembered that help is still on a minimum scale; there is no trace of the comfort and abundant supplies which we associate with the word hospital. Moreover there will be severe fighting in the near future, and warm weather will bring with it a fresh crop of disease. We cannot afford to do less week by week, and we are confident that our readers and their friends will supply us with the needful funds. We have just heard that All Souls' Church, Winnipeg, is sending us £20, the proceeds of a concert. It is a generous gift, and we value it all the more because it is a gift from Canada.

THE most important political event of the past week is the retirement of M. Venezelos from public life. There is a widespread feeling that, while he has taken the only step consistent with his own dignity, a man of his distinguished gifts will not be allowed to abandon his career. For the sake of Greece and the union of the Balkan States it is desirable that he should be recalled at the earliest possible moment. He is the one statesman who has the imagination to envisage the whole Balkan problem in its true perspective, and the courage to advise his own country to accept some sacrifice, contrary to its own sentiment and desire, for the sake of a permanent settlement. Meanwhile, the situation is one of chaos and drift. The conflicts and jealousies which paralyse action, may be silenced at any moment by the victory of the Allies; but common action, prompted by fear, must have a very different result from a union based upon mutual concessions and agreements, which M. Venezelos has worked so hard to promote. His retirement at the present moment is a distinct check to far-sighted statesmanship and the peace of the world.

* * *

ON Monday The Daily Chronicle gave great prominence to an interview with the Pope, which has been published in The New York World. It is in the form of an exhortation to the American people "to work unceasingly and disinterestedly for peace"; and is full of pious sentiments and flamboyant journalese. The Vatican is credited with pro-German sympathies; but it is remarkable that it should have risen so easily to the bait of this enterprising German-American correspondent. The whole thing, which is not lacking in a clever instinct for the picturesque, is only another dodge in the German press campaign. If Mr. Karl von Wiegand wants to be taken seriously he had better conceal his name.

* * *

As for the contents of the interview they are banal in the extreme, and consist of little more than the usual common-places about peace, with an insinuation that the Kaiser was willing to accept humanitarian suggestions "to secure an amelioration of the conditions, horrors, and miseries of the war," which were rejected by the Allies. In so far as all this vague talk may be accepted as representing the real mind of the Vatican it is a terrible revelation of moral impotence. There is here nothing to suggest that the Pope is deeply concerned about his outraged children in Belgium. There is no warning note of judgment, no plain rebuke of wrong. He says what it is diplomatic for him to say, and uses an enterprising journalist, whose motives are deeply suspect, in order to announce these complacent trivialities to the world.

* * *

DR. J. HOLLAND ROSE, writing in The Daily Chronicle on Wednesday, thinks that there is a plain political motive in the interview, and that it indicates the line of action that will be taken by sympathisers with Germany and Austria in the not distant future. He points out that the influence of these two Powers, especially of Austria, is very great at the Vatican. The interests of the Papacy are bound up with the maintenance of Hapsburg rule both in Galicia and in Bosnia, while the spread of Hapsburg power throughout the Western Balkans would also have served the interests of the Roman Church. For these reasons, the trend of Vatican politics has been consistently pro-German; and Dr. Rose thinks that it is by no means improbable that the present appeal of the Pope to America is an outcome of the recent mission of Prince Bülow to Rome. Certainly it is clumsy enough to be the fruit of German intrigue.

IN the same article Dr. Rose warns us not to indulge the idea that a neutral Power can intervene with any effect in the arrangement of peace. It is, he reminds us, the traditional policy of Germany not to brook such interference; but there are signs already that she is preparing the way for an emotional appeal to the American people as soon as she herself is invaded. He also utters the following warning, as vigorous as it is sensible, of the danger of talking about peace at the present stage of the war.

May I venture, as a student of history, to warn the many generous-hearted people who are beginning to talk about peace of the peril of their conduct? The Power that first makes proposals of peace is always considered to be unable long to continue the war. Talk of that description is therefore the best possible means of encouraging your enemy; and it is probable that when Germany, Austria, and Turkey want peace they will find some indirect and less compromising means of bringing about the first pourparlers. The Power that flings wide its arms and cries out, "My brother, this has all been a horrible misunderstanding, come to my heart and forget the past," will probably get a home-thrust for its pains. Germany believes in and practises secret diplomacy. She knows all the tricks of the game; and it is certain that she views with delight (and perhaps finds means of encouraging) our passionate revolt against secret diplomacy. Bismarck more than once avowed to Busch his dislike for publicity in diplomatic procedure; and a study of German proceedings in Europe and South Africa shows that his ways still hold good at Berlin.

* * *

WE are glad to hear an influential voice in the United States speaking in the same strain. Dr. C. W. Eliot, in an address to a meeting of Baptist ministers in Boston on Monday, warned them not to desire peace too soon.

Do not pray for peace now [he said], I cannot conceive a worse catastrophe for the human race than peace in Europe now. If it were declared now, Germany would be in possession of Belgium, and German aggressive militarism would have triumphed. That would be a success for Germany after she had committed the greatest crime a nation can commit—namely, faithlessness to treaty rights—and the sanctity of contracts would pass for nothing, and civilisation would be set back for centuries. I do not see how any thinking American can keep himself neutral. Liberty and every other American ideal are involved in this war.

When some of his hearers asked him when they might begin to pray for peace, Dr. Eliot replied: "When Germany is driven back into her own territory and forced to pay full indemnity to Belgium."

* * *

THE organisation of work for the war is proceeding in an admirable spirit, and many of the difficulties and misunderstandings of a few weeks ago have been surmounted. A large meeting of engineering and shipbuilding societies held at Newcastle on Monday expressed its hearty approval of the formation of the North-East Coast Munitions of War Committee, on which the men, the employers, and Government Departments are represented. They also sent the following message to the Prime Minister: "We do not want any more speeches about the failings of the workers, the employers, or the Government; we want to pull together and get on with it. You may tell Lord Kitchener that we shall deliver the goods. The working man of the North-East Coast will do his bit." In Liverpool Lord Derby's scheme for enrolling the dockers in a corps of war-workers, dressed in khaki and subject to simple military discipline, seems to be achieving excellent results.

PARLIAMENT met on Wednesday, and one of its chief duties will be to deal with the question of drink. The country is agreed that there must be a far-reaching measure of public control. The Government is wise not to act without the assent of the House of Commons, and we are not impatient because they have not suddenly scotched the evil with a stroke of the pen. Meanwhile, the example of the King stands, and the campaign on behalf of voluntary abstinence should be pressed with vigour. We print to-day a special appeal to our own readers, signed by Mr. Hugh Rathbone and Mr. J. F. L. Brunner, M.P., on this subject. It ought to be met with a ready and eager assent. For most of us no sacrifice is required; but in homes where total abstinence for the war will cause some breach with social habit and the customs of hospitality, we hope that private taste and convenience will not be allowed to interfere with the common action which is required in the public interest.

* * *

MR. G. B. WILSON, whose annual survey of the National Drink Bill was published in The Times on Tuesday, gives some important statistics of persons employed in the Trade. These go to prove that the argument against prohibition, which is based upon the danger of unemployment, has no validity. It appears that 271,017 men and 115,028 women are thus employed. Of these 191,000 men are under 45 years of age, and, in view of the present demand for labour, employable persons; while at least one-fourth of the whole are men engaged in auxiliary occupations not necessarily connected with the sale of liquor, such as engineers, carters, clerks, and travellers, for most of whom employment is open to-day. Of the women employed, approximately 60 per cent are under 35 years of age. At least 64,000 (or 55 per cent) are unmarried. Twenty-four thousand are almost entirely domestic servants or clerks, whose occupations are not necessarily connected with the Trade. The question of diverting this body of labour to other occupations does not, accordingly, present the difficulties which some people suppose.

* * *

THE honourable profession of the Law seems to be in some danger of unemployment owing to the war. In spite of the fact that 4,000 barristers and solicitors have joined the army those who remain are beginning to complain of a real shortage of work. The Easter lists contain only 1,162 cases, a decrease of 202 compared with the same date last year. No doubt the common enemy has made us less combative and litigious at home, and many people have discovered that going to law is one of the luxuries which they can do without. Though the lawyers may languish, it is a happy result for the nation as a whole.

TEPID EMOTIONS.

THE purveyor of gentle moralities is at all times a rather pathetic figure. He seems ill at ease among the hard realities of the world. The faults of other men lie with a weary weight upon his heart. The great passions which possess and dominate the soul seem to him to be more dangerous than admirable. He is afraid of losing his balance, of moving too swiftly with the crowd, of being fired by anger or thrilled by the sound of the trumpet. Gifted with a refined sensitiveness to the blots in human character and the subtle dangers which lurk even in such simple duties as loving our children or serving our country, he spends his time in well-mannered rebuke of our possible sins. His motto is that of a famous Scotch clan Gang warily, "for your adversary the devil, as a roaring lion, walketh about, seeking whom he may devour."

In ordinary times we are inclined to take this kind of chiding in good part. There is prudence in it; it chimes in with our need of humility; and its tepid emotion is no great offence to our own mood. But when we are roused, when we ourselves are actors in events to which God has joined great issues for mankind, when we must do our deed with courage and decision or stand condemned for ever as renegades in the cause of freedom and honour; then the voice which scolds us for our violence or warns us daily of the snares of hatred and vindictiveness—never pulsing with the fervour of admiration, never throbbing with the organ notes of national duty and national glory, can only be heard with impatience; it may be with anger. And justly so; for the hour is too terrible for any counsellor, who still clings to moral neutrality, or does his duty sadly, or minimises the supreme issues of the present conflict, without the biting edge of decision in his words and the joy of combat for the right in his blood.

It is comparatively easy here in England for men of a cool and collected temperament to cultivate this pose. They go about their ordinary pursuits almost untouched by the convulsion of the nations, and the war seems to exist for them chiefly as a topic for endless moralisings. We do not mean that there are many people of this kind, fortunately that is not the case; but they are vocal out of all proportion to their numbers. They write letters to the press. They bombard us with pamphlets. They utter sad warnings from the pulpit of our apostasy from justice and charity. Two things usually characterise this type of utterance. One is their reproachful tone, as though we ought all to go about as criminals because we are at war. The other is the claim that they alone represent the spirit of Christianity in an unbelieving generation. They solve no doubts. They allay no fears. But they do manage to diffuse a temper of irresolution and self-conscious questioning among some of their readers, who are by nature more prone to gentle sentiments than to stern and unbending loyalty to a cause.

This is a source of danger against which we must be on our guard. It is one to which broad-minded men, who have learned to take a genial interest in human life as a whole, are specially exposed. Our problem is not that of toning down emotion and refraining from strong words, lest we should be overtaken in some fault. It is the problem of combining strong feeling and stern speech and an unswerving fulfilment of duty with kindness and magnanimity. Christianity is not a dream of peace; it is a way of life, and no man can follow it until he has learned to be greatly daring in his use of the fiery passions of the soul. There is room in the good man's life for wrath and indignation and flaming words of judgment, if they are used not to satisfy personal resentment but for the purposes of God; but there is no place for tepid emotions and moral nervousness.

If we are exposed to many and great dangers, as our mentors warn us, we shall find safety first of all in the habits of Christian reverence and self-control in which we have been trained, and then in active and generous service of the need of the hour. If anything can help us to solve the riddle of the war and to see light shining through its darkness, it is here that we must find it. No man has ever been argued out of ill-will or lectured into benevolence. These things come only by the way of active obedience. The life that spends itself in helping will have neither time nor inclination for hating. Perhaps the moralisers also have their use; but we prefer to put our trust in the medicinal virtue of loving service to keep the hands clean and the heart pure and the soul free from vanity and ill-will.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

THE MAJESTY OF THE LAW.

STRENGTH may be met with strength; the power of inflicting pain may be baffled by the pride of endurance; the eye of rage may be answered with the stare of defiance, or the downcast look of dark and determined resolve; and with all this there is an outward and determined object to which the mind can attach its passions and purposes, and bury its own disquietudes in the full occupation of the senses. But who dares struggle with an invisible combatant? With an enemy which exists and makes us know its existence; but where it is, we ask in vain. No space contains it; time promises no control over it, it has no ear for threats, it has no substance that my hands can grasp, or my weapons find vulnerable, it commands and cannot be commanded, it acts and is insusceptible of my reaction; the more I strive to subdue it, and the more I think of it, the more do I find it to possess a reality out of myself, and not to be a phantom of my own imagination; that all but the most abandoned men, acknowledge its authority, and that the whole strength and majesty of my country are pledged to support it, and yet that for me its power is the same with that of my own permanent self, and that all the choice that is permitted to me consists in having it for my guardian angel or my avenging fiend! This is the spirit of law! the lute of Amphion! the harp of Orpheus! This is the true necessity which compels man into the social state, now and always, by a still-beginning, never-ceasing force of moral cohesion.—From 'The Friend,' by Samuel Taylor Coleridge.

My God, I'm wounded by my sin,
And sore without, and sick within.
I come to Thee, in hope to find Salve for my body and my mind.
In Gilead, though no balm be found
To ease this smart or cure this wound,
Yet, Lord, I know there is with Thee
All saving help, and help for me.
Then reach Thou forth that hand of Thine,
That pours in oil as well as wine,
And let it work, for I'll endure
The utmost smart so Thou wilt cure.

HERRICK.

BLESS us, O God, with the love of Thee, and of our neighbour. Give us peace of conscience, the command of our affections; and for the rest, Thy will be done! O King of peace, keep us in love and charity. AMEN.

OUR VISIT TO THE BEL- GIAN HOSPITALS.

WHEN I look back on ten days spent among the Belgian Military Hospitals, the first picture that rises in my mind is one of endless rows of beds, and in each a broken man—beds in schoolrooms, in chapels, in factories, in private houses, in ships. I visited 35 hospitals in all, of which 30 were for Belgians, and to most of which our Fund has been a real support. The conditions are, indeed, greatly improved, but they still, alas! leave much to be desired. Every patient has a bed now, and bed linen of a sort—often very ragged and discoloured—and here and there, where our red flannel jackets and striped blankets were to be seen, the wards had quite a cheerful air. In the few hospitals where there were women nurses a little attempt had been made to have flowers in the windows and to dispose of the few things they had to give the place a more homelike air, but this was very rare. In many wards there was no furniture but the beds, and sometimes one table—occasionally two or three chairs. The picture of one ward rises in my mind as I write. We visited it on a wet, dreary afternoon. There were only plank beds, the thin mattresses and the bedding were rolled up to the head of the bed, and the men had the planks to sit on—nothing else. These were all mental and nervous cases, and a more unpromising condition of things for their recovery, it is difficult to imagine. Yet they do recover, and I think it is largely due to the delightful personality of the doctor-in-charge. He is a fine looking young man, one of the few we met whose mind was at rest about his family, whose photos he brought out to show his English friends—for he at once accepted us as such. He showed us a man who had come in from the trenches that day, bereft of all power of speech. He sat with his head on his hands, and would not be roused; but there was hope for him, as another man to whom we spoke had come in in a similar condition only a week before, and could then talk fairly well and was improving daily.

These mental cases are the saddest of all, and next come the sick—the cases of rheumatism, pneumonia, chest, heart, and liver troubles, and the typhoid cases. The wounded are everywhere cheerful, and even the loss of a limb does not seem to depress them. Pain they have, but they say nothing of it, and are only eager to recount their trench exploits to a sympathetic English visitor. This friendly reception was one of the real pleasures of our visit. As soon as the doctor announced to the men “these are English friends, who have sent us so much to make you comfortable,” there were smiles on all sides. Sometimes the men would tell us that they had been in England, and how happy and well treated they were there, and how they hoped to complete their convalescence there if they were lucky.

Undoubtedly the most homelike atmosphere was in the hospitals under the care of the communities of sisters. I shall always remember a visit to the Sœurs Franciscaines, paid very early one morning. We were taken to the parlour on arriving, and soon there came to us the sister in charge. She entered softly, clasping her hands together, and, with a face full of pain, said: “Ah we are in such sorrow, our Mother is dead two days since—we are orphans.” She sat down and told us of their loss. The Head of their Order, a beautiful and gracious woman, who the week before had sent us courteous thanks for our help, lay dead of pneumonia. We said a few words of sympathy, and the sister with exquisite courtesy put aside her grief and took us round the wards, talking cheerfully of the hospital work to us and to the patients. They have a large hospital, and, like the Little Sisters of the Poor, had given up all their beds to the men and officers. Unfortunately, their beds are all too short for the men, but we are sending others, and they will have them by this time. Everywhere they gratefully pointed out our gifts—here a dressing-gown, there feeding cups for the helpless, a new thermometer on the wall, and the Belgian doctor added his thanks for the lives and limbs saved by the instruments with which we supplied him.

Two interesting small hospitals were in Wesleyan chapels—one French and one English—lent by their pastors to the Belgian military authorities. The buildings were, of course, entirely unsuitable, and the beds much too close together, but there was a kindly spirit pervading the place, which made up for much. Two patients interested us specially: one, a bright-faced lad of 18 years, whose parents were in Brussels and to whom and from whom he could get no news; and an older man, with haunted eyes, who knew nothing of the fate of his wife and two babies for many months. It is touching to see their faith in our power to help them and their eagerness to give us the details. The pride of the professional staff was in the small sterilising apparatus, we had sent them, which was laid out, with a number of other medical necessities, on the communion table!

The pulpit served as a store cupboard, and the vestry as kitchen—very ill-equipped for its task of feeding 60 patients. I remember the delighted greeting given to our lady chauffeur when she marched in with a kettle and teapot in one hand and a pile of enamelled plates in the other!

We visited another hospital in a lace factory later on, taking with us four cases of gifts from our Fund. It was certainly a delightful experience to drive about on a motor lorry, personally delivering these things, helping the unpacking, and watching the doctor's delight. Here the whole staff of specialists (in throat and ear and nose) fell upon the cases of instruments for their work, and were soon as happy as boys, fitting the parts together and showing us their use. These delicate and specialised instruments are beyond their power to obtain through their ordinary channels, and yet for the saving of hearing, and the performance of difficult operations, they are most essential. Then it was the nurses' turn, and loud admiration was expressed for the shirts and socks, slippers, &c., we had brought. “The stock vanishes so quickly, we never have enough,” said one. In the specialised hospitals particularly, as soon as a man is on the road to recovery he passes on to other more general hospitals, so that a great number pass through the wards in a short time, and all need fresh clothes when they go away. At the large eye hospital we found the head oculist gloating over a box of testing glasses and some curiously delicate eye instruments which he had been longing to have, and which we had brought out for him. All the “eye” cases in the Belgian army are sent to him; some stay an hour or two and return, others need operations and treatment for weeks. Here again, the doctor urged the need of more shirts, socks, and slippers, as the outgoings are so large, in spite of all clothes being sterilised, washed, and mended where possible for future use. Towels and handkerchiefs were also in great request. The hospital under the charge of the English girls of the First Aid Nursing Yeomanry was one of the most cheery. At the moment of our arrival there were scarcely any wounded, though the typhoid wards were, alas, full. But the activities of the members of the Corps are not confined to hospital work. One of them who had received the order of Leopold II. from King Albert's hands the week before for bravery in tending the wounded under fire, drove me round Calais delivering bales of clothes and other goods, and working like a navvy lifting the things in and out. The “Little Sisters” were charmed with our new chauffeur, and she with their delight in the parcels, and it was difficult to say good-bye and go on to the next place. Some of the Corps had that day gone off to the bombarded villages at the front to fill up their time in tending refugees and carrying them to safety. They might be back that day, or several days hence—but it did not matter as they would sleep anywhere—on straw or in their ambulance, and draw rations as part of the army wherever they were.

This is the beautiful side of war, if anything so horrible can have a beautiful side—the spirit of ungrudging helpfulness and camaraderie that I met everywhere: “You want a motor to get somewhere. Well, here is mine. A lorry? Certainly. What are we here for but to be of use?” It was the same with the Belgians. It was a pouring wet afternoon, General——called at the hotel immediately after lunch and left his motor at our disposal for the afternoon—half an hour after a doctor from one of the hospitals arrived with another, which he had scoured the town to borrow for us! We were English and their friends—it was enough for them that we wanted help.

I must finish with a word about the new Dental Institution. This was housed in a small room, which also served as waiting-room. For the moment the surgeon dentist had a chair—a truly ramshackle affair; but it was only lent for a short time, as was also the excavating apparatus. He is to have a chair (a good second-hand one) and an excavator from our Fund by the end of this week; also an apparatus for giving gas, as many of these poor invalids have such shattered nerves they can scarcely face the ordeal of an extraction without it. Then he was rejoicing over a steriliser for instruments, and a small useful collection of forceps, drills, &c., with which we had supplied him. He has about forty patients a day generally, and now that he is equipped will be able to do much better work.

There is one clear fact that I want to impress on all our contributors. We have been the means of saving life by this Fund; not only have we saved suffering and discomfort, but actually life and limbs. The mortality in the typhoid hospitals has gone down appreciably since we sent them the means of nursing that they lacked, and the wounded have had the surgical aid they needed. As far as I could see all that we have sent is being carefully and properly used, and fills a real need. Of course, we found a great many needs of which we were unaware before; but so far the support sent to us has been so generous, that now that we can assure contributors of our own personal knowledge of the good done, and the lives saved, we cannot doubt that friends will continue to support the work already begun. Next week I hope to write about other hospitals which I was able to visit quite near the firing line.

INTERNATIONAL ETHICS.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—After reading the interesting paper by Mr. Chancellor on ‘The Value of Nationality’ in your issue of April 10 I should be glad to be allowed to make a few comments emphasising his point with regard to “moralising international politics.” For this seems really to lie at the root not only of the present war, but of all wars between nations. This point seems certain, that the whole trouble might be cured if the civilised of the world would adopt, as nations, the simple fundamental ethics of Christianity. This statement sounds trite enough, but it is, nevertheless, very largely disbelieved in theory and disregarded in practice. Let me be more specific. As between individuals we act (however imperfectly) upon the divine maxim “Look not every man on his own things, but every man also on the things of others.” Doubtless a man’s first duty is to himself; to live well his own life. But “no man liveth unto himself” alone, and no man can truly live his own life without due regard to his fellowmen, and the man who attempts to do so is a “selfish” and unworthy character. Now apply this to nations, and the truth may dawn upon us that the fact that hitherto the great moral rule that has been in vogue with individuals has been held not to apply to nations is mainly responsible for the untold misery that strife and warfare have brought about. Though we have long acknowledged that the maxim “Every man for himself and the devil take the hindmost” is a devil’s maxim, we have yet justified and for the most part acted upon the maxim “Every nation for itself and the devil take the rest.”

To put the matter in another form. As regards the individuals of a State it is an established principle among all civilised nations that the system of “taking the law into your own hands” does not answer, and so they employ laws and a police force. In other words, “war”—the use of physical force—in social life, for the settlement of disputes, is condemned in all civilised States. Now I maintain that we want this principle extended, and applied not only as between the individuals of each State, but as between one State and another. As between individuals in a nation, when a quarrel breaks out the law stands ready to act as umpire and the police to enforce the decision. Why should not a similar practice prevail under an international parliament of states—an agreement to refer all disputes to arbitration and to abide by the award given, and only such amount of armaments be allowed to each nation as would be sufficient to act as an international police force, powerful enough to enforce the award of the arbitrators?

Now may it not be affirmed that one main reason why we have in the past acted upon a different moral rule as between States from what we have as regards individuals lies in our misconception of the true function and meaning of the “State”? The true function of the State surely is to promote the well-being of its members. Instead of this the chief business of the State often is to extend the power, to increase the area, to expand the markets, to increase the wealth (that is the possessions) of the State. True, it may be said, that in extending the power, the area, the markets, the wealth of the State you will also promote the well-being of the members. This may be so, but it is not necessarily so. The chief thing is to keep the true end always in view. In pursuing the end, means have to be used. Now in using the means there is always a tendency to forget the end—to turn the means into the end, and rest there. In what a variety of ways can this be illustrated! Take the case of Political Economy. Increase of wealth is a good thing for the nation. But how often the means employed for this end have contributed more to the “illth” than to the “wealth” of the people! So with war. Extension of power, territory, markets, instead of a means has often become an end, regardless of the true end—the real welfare of the nation. Let the great wars of history be judged by this standard, and see the result! Now these false and exaggerated views of the functions of the State have recently been exhibited in glaring form in the literature and military practice of Germany. By way of showing what strangely low moral and social ideals Germany puts before her I quote a passage from Bernhardt’s celebrated book ‘Germany and the Next War’: “Above the rivalry of individuals within the State stands the Law. Behind the Law stands the State. But there is no power that stands above the rivalry of States to restrain injustice. Between States the only check on injustice is force, and in morality and civilisation each people must play its own part and promote its own ends and ideals. If in doing so it comes into conflict with the ideals and views of other States, it must either submit to the rival State or appeal to force and face the risk of war in order to make its own views prevail.”

I maintain that the whole conception of “a State” as held at the present moment by Germany is diametrically opposed to the fundamental ideas embodied in Christianity, ideas which have been struggling, in the teeth of strenuous opposition, for nearly 2,000 years to gain the mastery among mankind. “Love thy neighbour as thyself.” “Do unto others as ye would they should do unto you.”

Now the German view is that these moral precepts apply only in the case of individuals—only as between man and man—but not as between one nation and another. Bernhardt says: “The acts of the State cannot be judged by the standard of individual morality... The morality of the State must be judged by the nature and raison d’être of the State and not of the individual citizen.” In the light of these views international treaties are of the flimsiest validity, and anything in the direction of international arbitration is out of the question. Treitschke plainly avers that “International treaties which restrict the will of the State are no absolute barriers, but voluntary limitations of itself. From which certainly follows, that the erection of an international court of arbitration as a permanent institution is incompatible with the nature of the State.” What it all comes to is this: that each nation must do what it has been found impossible for individuals to do, namely, take the law into its own hands. It means that, as between nations, the barbarous law of absolute “selfishness” in its plainest, boldest, and most pernicious form is to prevail. Listen again to Bernhardt, "Each nation evolves its own conception of Right." "No self-respecting nation would sacrifice its own conception of Right to any international rule; by so doing it would renounce its own highest ideals." As one has well said, "The whole philosophy seems paganism, or rather barbarism, with a moral veneer."—Yours. &c., P. E. VIZARD.

THE STORY OF DANTE.

IV.—THE BIG ADVENTURE.

In his travels Dante visited many cities. He saw citizen turn against citizen, city against city, kingdom against kingdom. Troubled at the strife in the world about him, troubled at the evil in his own heart, he longed for an Earthly Paradise, where, instead of hate and strife, there should be love and peace and joy and beauty. As a traveller Dante looked up and beyond the sun, moon, and stars into the blue depths of the heavens. His thoughts dwelt more and more on a Heavenly Paradise—the High Heaven, "The kingdom where the angels are at peace." He was used to being a traveller, journeying towards the unseen, and to him, as to Peter Pan, to die was a "big adventure."

Do you remember Peter Pan in the Lagoon standing alone on the little rock, whilst the tide rises gradually and surely, and he waits, as he thinks, for death to come to him? He is not much afraid, though his heart beats with big thumps. In the fight with his cruel enemy, Capt. Hook, the pirate, Peter has played fair—and won—thanks to the crocodile. When Wende joined him on the rock he had helped to save her. For a chance of escape coming for one of them, he had of course made Wende go. He was not much afraid, but there was a thrill of wonder at what seemed to lie before him. "To die will be an awfully big adventure."

In these times of war brave men join the forces, ready to fight for justice, for fair play, to protect women and children, and their homes, and the war is to them "an awfully big adventure" in a very solemn way. And what about that other "big adventure" that for so many lies beyond the battlefield? Those who have, like Peter Pan, played the Man in a true sense, need not be much afraid. Those who have not played fair or have acted with cruelty will have, we believe, much to learn in the life beyond.

As he wandered from place to place in exile Dante saw all sorts of people, and perhaps wondered how they would fare in the big adventure of the future. His great poem is his picture of what he imagined the "big adventure" would be like for others and for himself. The cruel, the unjust, the mean, the proud would have much to learn and much to be ashamed of. His own great fault, he tells us, was pride, and he must have tried very hard to overcome it, for we find him not too proud to learn, not too proud to confess his fault, as you will see.

In Dante's time people pictured the unseen world of spirits who have passed on from this life, as in three parts, the Paradiso, or heaven for the good; the Inferno for the bad; and another, Purgatorio (Purgatory) for those who had repented and were learning through punishment to be better.

The portrait of Dante, with other Florentines painted after he left Florence, and now on the walls of the Palace Chapel, was part of a big picture of heaven. Below, standing on the ground, are living men and women, poets, churchmen, monks and nuns, cardinals, and two figures with crowns like kings or emperors. Above these are rows and rows of saints and angels, and, above all, higher than the clouds is a seated figure to represent the "Lord of Heaven." Some of the faces are still quite clear, others have faded away or have been spoilt with the whitewash or with the falling of the plaster.

Dante pictured the Inferno as a deep, dark place underground. Purgatory he imagined to be in the sunshine and the starlight, on the slopes of an island mountain in the far-off southern seas, beyond where men had then sailed. On the top of this mount of Purgatory he pictured the Earthly Paradise; whilst the Heavenly Paradise—where Beatrice had gone to live with the angels—he pictured as beyond the sun, moon, planets, and stars.

The purity and goodness of Beatrice had long ago made Heaven seem nearer and more real to him. She had seemed to draw his thoughts upwards and to lead his hopes heavenwards. At the same time he thought of her with "a humbled and ashamed heart." He knew that he had far to travel and much to learn before he could be fit to enter her presence in the company of saints and angels. In his humility he was ready to travel any distance, to face any difficulty, to suffer any pain in the hope of once more seeing his gentle lady. L. H.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE GUILDS' UNION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

AMONG the young people of the Midlands rambles are the order of the day on Easter Monday. It was therefore a venture of faith on the part of the Midland Guilds' Union to invite the National Conference Guilds' Union to hold its Annual Meeting in Birmingham on that day. A large attendance of ministers, delegates, and members, and an inspiring series of meetings and services, however, amply vindicated the action of the promoters. The proceedings opened with a meeting of the Council, following which the Rev. E. Glyn Evans, Secretary of the Midland Guilds' Union, conducted a devotional service in the beautiful Old Meeting Church, and delivered an address—the burden of which was an earnest plea for a more absolute, implicit and Christ-like faith in God as an indispensable condition for realising fully, in heart and soul, the true grace and sublime blessing of Eastertide.

The Annual Business Meeting was held in the Schoolroom, the chair being occupied by the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, who heartily supported the work of the Guilds and urged the paramount need of intimate dealing with young people in the deeper matters of the spirit. The ministers present were the Revs. Helen L. Phillips, H. Harrold Johnson, A. H. Shelley, J. Arthur Pearson, Leonard Short, Hugh Warnock, Thomas Graham, Frank Coleman, E. Glyn Evans, W. G. Topping, H. C. Hawkins, Stanley R. Gibbon, and H. Fisher Short. Apologies for absence were received from the Rev. W. H. Lambelle (President), the Rev. J. J. Wright (Vice-President), Mr. H. P. Greg (Treasurer), the Revs. John Ellis, W. G. Price, Mortimer Rowe, and Mr. H. Whitaker.

On the motion of the chairman seconded by Mr. D. Craft, the Annual Report and Statement of Accounts were adopted. Despite increased expenditure on printing and travelling, the Treasurer reported a balance in hand of £1 6s. 2d. The Annual Report expressed regret that owing to the widespread unrest no new Guilds had been enrolled. Still, the Council had not been inactive. Its members had paid friendly visits to Guilds, and addressed special meetings to explain the Guild idea. The Secretary had endeavoured to interest every minister on the roll of the Essex Hall Year Book in the work of the Union, and had sent out throughout the denomination a leaflet on 'How to Make a Children's Guild.' The Union had been in close touch with the Sunday School Association and, by invitation, had taken part in a conference on Young People's Societies, and also in the Oxford Summer Session for Sunday School workers. In addition, at the request of Mr. T. M. Chalmers, a letter had been issued to the Guilds urging them to do all they could to alleviate distress caused by the war. Congratulations were tendered to all Guild workers, a special compliment being paid to the Midland Guilds' Union on its fine labours during the year. The Report ended with the following appeal:—

"The future of the Guild movement will be determined largely by our spirit and bearing and behaviour in the trying present. The personal faith of many Christians is undergoing a severe test. The confidence of not a few has broken down. Some anxious souls are in doubt as to the reality of Christianity, whilst a few feel that their hold upon God has been weakened. In the brief life of our Union, we have never been confronted with so fine a challenge, so splendid an opportunity, so grave a responsibility. We have dared to take our stand 'for God and the Good Life,' and the demand of the hour is that we shall make our vaunting true. Amid the disturbance and the turmoil, we are called to pursue our good work without haste and without rest. Amid the wreckage of crumbling creeds and enfeebled faiths, we have to be strong in the Lord and to bear unbroken and unwavering witness to the presence of God and the saving power of the spirit of Christ. Let these be the instant aims of each Guild worker and the future of our movement shall be abundantly blessed."

Rev. J. Arthur Pearson was welcomed as the representative of the Sunday School Association. He congratulated the Union on its work, rejoiced in the co-operation of the two societies during the year, and expressed the hope that the future would find them more closely associated in their common task of religious instruction and inspiration.

Gratitude was expressed to the Rev. H. Bodell Smith for kindly publishing, free of cost, a regular Guild column in The Unitarian Monthly, and hearty thanks were given to all who contributed to the success of the day's proceedings.

The Annual Rally was held in the evening in the Church. The service was conducted by the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, and addressed by Mr. E. A. Smith, University College, Nottingham; Miss Helen L. Phillips, Christ Church, Nottingham; and the Rev. H. Harrold Johnson, Evesham. Mr. Smith spoke on 'Religion and Worship,' while Miss Phillips took for her subject 'Religion and Private Devotion.' In an address on 'Religion and Confirmation,' the Rev. H. Harrold Johnson outlined a scheme he had recently adopted at Evesham. A number of preparaiton classes had been held, followed by a confirmation service on the first Sunday of the New Year. Whilst desirous of conserving liberty in theology, he pleaded for more uniformity of order in public worship. The greatest enemy of our churches was individualism gone mad. What was urgently needed was a common hymnal, a common liturgy, a common order for the reception of Church members. Condemning mere registration and the cash nexus, he insisted on an adequate sense of the responsibility of Church membership as pointing the way to real confirmation of faith.

The new Council comprises the following officers and members: President Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas; Vice-Presidents, Revs. J. J. Wright and W. H. Lambelle; Treasurer, Mr. H. P. Greg; General Secretary, Miss Minnie Twist; Secretary for Topics and Essay Schemes, Rev. Mortimer Rowe; Extension Secretary, Rev. H. Fisher Short; Council, Miss Badland, Miss Ada Short, Mr. R. M. Entwistle, Revs. John Ellis, J. Arthur Pearson, W. G. Price, F. Coleman, W. G. Topping, E. Glyn Evans, and L. Redfern.

THE NATIONAL PEACE COUNCIL.

THE war, far from lessening the need for the persistent work of such a body as the National Peace Council, has greatly increased it, and its members are active in many ways which will be remembered with gratitude when the time comes for resuming the international relationships so suddenly broken off eight months ago. One of the most useful pieces of work undertaken by the Council after the outbreak of hostilities was the organisation of the Messages Committee to act, in conjunction with the German and Dutch Peace Societies, as a medium of communication for lost and stranded persons of the different nationalities. Since then hundreds of letters and replies have passed through the office at Westminster, involving a large amount of labour, especially in the case of letters written in Hungarian or Yiddish which have to be translated. In many cases the writer or recipient is found to be destitute, and appeals for help have to be met by the Emergency Relief Committee. Sometimes a German father will make a request that efforts should be made to get his son out of a detention camp on grounds of health or age, and the aid of the Camps Committee is sought. In this way a great deal is being done to mitigate the suffering inevitably caused by war, and the warmest thanks are given by the Council to Jhr. de Jong van Beek en Donk at the Hague, and to Dr. Röttcher at Stuttgart for their hearty co-operation.

The following particulars about postal arrangements may be of use to some of our readers:—

MESSAGES AND LETTERS TO GERMANY.

Messages of a personal and domestic nature can be sent to the National Peace Council, and will be forwarded through the Dutch Peace Society at The Hague to the German Peace Society at Stuttgart. The Stuttgart Office will distribute them to the persons whose names and addresses are given. Messages must be quite short and may be in English or German.

Letters are sent from the Council's Office to the Dutch Peace Society to be forwarded into Germany. They must be accompanied by an international postal coupon, price 3d., obtainable at any Post Office, to pay for the postage from Holland onwards. All letters must be open for examination by the postal censors. The full names and addresses of both the sender and the person sent to must be given.

If an answer is desired the writer should explain to the person written to that the answer may be sent to the Secretary of the German Peace Society (Deutsche Friedensgesellschaft), Werfmershalde, 14, Stuttgart, or to the Secretary of the Dutch Peace Society (Algemeenen Nederlandschen Bond Vrede door Recht), Theresiastraat 51, The Hague, together with an international postal coupon for forwarding to Great Britain.

LETTERS TO AUSTRIA AND HUNGARY.

THE National Peace Council cannot undertake to forward messages to Austria-Hungary, but letters can be sent as for Germany. Replies should be sent to the care of the Dutch Peace Society.

LETTERS TO BELGIUM.

THE German Peace Society (Deutsche Friedensgesellschaft), Werfmershalde 14, Stuttgart, has received permission from the German Civil Governor in Belgium to send to him letters of a personal and domestic nature for transmission to Belgians in Belgium.

Belgians desiring to correspond with their relatives in Belgium may, therefore, send such letters through the National Peace Council, 167, St. Stephen's House, Westminster, S.W. They will be sent to the Dutch Peace Society, Theresiastraat 51, The Hague, and will be forwarded to Stuttgart for transmission to Belgium.

All letters must be in French or German. They should be sent open to the National Peace Council's Office, and accompanied by two International Coupons, price 3d. each (obtainable at any post office), to pay for postage from Holland to Germany, and from Germany to Belgium.

The full name and address of the sender and of the person written to must be given.

Letters for Brussels and Verviers, which are the only two towns in direct communication with Germany, will be forwarded direct from The Hague through the Dutch and German post offices; and these, therefore, require but one International Coupon, as they have to be re-posted once only.

ALCOHOL AND PERSONAL EFFICIENCY.

THE following resolution was passed at the last meeting of the Committee of the Sunday School Association:—

"The Committee of the S.S.A., believing that a general abstinence from alcoholic beverages must be of untold benefit to the country in this time of national emergency, urges the officers, teachers and scholars of our Sunday Schools and the leaders and members of all institutions connected with them, together with the young people of our congregations, to abstain from such beverages, and invites them to use all their influence with others to do the same."

The Committee trust that all who are concerned will do their utmost to further this movement in the Churches and Schools.

THE REV. T. L. MARSHALL.

CELEBRATION OF HIS 90th BIRTHDAY.

THE REV. T. L. MARSHALL completed his 90th year on April 2. He entered the ministry in 1846, and after six years at Warwick held three London pulpits: Hackney, 1853-57; Stamford Street, 1858-62; Brixton, 1863-73. He was Editor of THE INQUIRER for more than thirty years, 1856-88; and Secretary of the Presbyterian Board for an even longer period, 1856-98. The following letter of congratulation has been sent to him on behalf of the Council of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association:—

March 31, 1915.

DEAR MR. MARSHALL,—Meeting in Council on the eve of your 90th birthday, we desire respectfully to join our greetings with those of your other friends on this truly memorable occasion. We are especially glad to know that, in spite of a length of days very rarely attained your interest is as keen as ever in all that makes for genuine liberality in religion and for enlightenment of mind.

It is over sixty years since you became a member of our Association, upon the Executive Committee of which you rendered valuable assistance from 1859 to 1898. Those who remain of your fellow-workers in earlier years are now few; but with their warm personal affection for you is joined the sincere regard of a younger generation, who recognise in you a worthy representative of leaders trusted and honoured in days gone by, and cherished in reverent remembrance.

In the work of the ministry and student preparation, you have always stood for breadth of theological sympathy, accurate learning, and unswerving uprightness in the pursuit of high ideals—qualities which have consistently marked your own career alike as a minister, a journalist, and a faithful administrator of important trusts.

Reminding ourselves gratefully of these things, we venture to hope that you may yet continue in your usual vigour to carry on the scholarly activity in which you have so long delighted, and that you will increasingly blend with the memories and anticipations of old age an assurance of the kindest good wishes of all who know you.

Signed on behalf of the Council,

J. F. L. BRUNNER, President.

W. COPELAND BOWIE, Secretary.

The Rev. T. L. Marshall has sent the following reply to the Secretary of the Association:—

Exeter, April 12, 1915.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY,—I am deeply touched on receiving the congratulatory Resolution of the Council of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association on my 90th birthday. I find it difficult to acknowledge it in suitable terms, but thank with all my heart the few old friends and associates still left, and many new ones, for the kind manner in which they have referred to such services as I have been able to render to the cause in which we are all deeply interested. I have always felt it to be a great honour to be associated for so many years with a succession of able fellow-workers who, with occasional differences of opinion, have always remained closely united under the banner of the same religious faith. I recall with much satisfaction my connection in the earliest years of my membership of the Committee—long before the Council was formed—with such honoured members as Mr. Madge, Mr. Tagart, Mr. Le Breton, Mr. Aspland and his brother, Mr. A. S. Aspland, at one time Treasurer, and many other of our leaders who have passed away, leaving me a lonely pilgrim on the sands of Time; but still guided by the inspiration of their noble characters and signal services to our pure religious faith. I hope for a little time longer to follow their example, and to contribute in however humble a way, to the work which we all have at heart. I may add that while in bygone years, I have sometimes written and spoken in too critical a spirit of the condition of many of our churches I have never lost faith for a moment in the essential truth, and the ultimate prevalence of our fundamental principles as expounded by the foremost writers of our churches.

With renewed expressions of gratitude for the kind Resolution with which the Council has favoured me, and with sentiments of personal regard for every one of my fellow-members, I remain theirs, one and all, most cordially and sincerely,

THOS. LETHERIDGE MARSHALL.

It is announced that the preacher at the King's Weigh House Church, Duke Street, W., on Sunday next, April 18, will be the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas of Birmingham.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Ambleside.—The Ambleside Parish Magazine for April contains the following paragraph:—"In these days of young men, when so often we are told a man is too old at 50, it is refreshing to be able to record the energy and devotion of our good neighbour, Mr. Harding of Ellerigg. Although in his 93rd year he set out with enthusiasm to raise money for poor suffering Serbia. The Vicar wished him and his fund might both get the hundred not out. On going to press we hear Mr. Harding has already got £100. We congratulate him heartily. It is a fine thing to have done, and his effort will appeal to every true Englishman and sportsman who admires pluck and determination."

Mr. Harding informs us that he has already remitted £100, and has £28 6s. in hand. The fund will close on April 17.

Belfast.—The Rev. G. A. Ferguson has accepted an invitation to supply the pulpit of the York Street Non-Subscribing Presbyterian Church for a period of six months, and will begin his duties on April 18.

Darlington.—Many of our readers will learn with interest that Miss Clara Lucas has been elected to serve on the Darlington Borough Council. Miss Lucas originally served on the old School Board, and was a co-opted member of the Borough Education Committee from its formation until November, 1910.

Glasgow.—A concert and entertainment, will be held at the Unitarian Church St. Vincent Street on Friday, April 23, in aid of THE INQUIRER Belgian Hospital Fund. The programme will include a lantern lecture on Constantinople by Mr. H. A. Nisbitt.

Horsham.—The usual series of winter Lectures was brought to a close on Thursday, April 8, when Prof. G. Dawes Hicks lectured on 'The teaching of George Eliot.' Previous lectures have been given by the Revs. J. Wood, H. M. Livens, and H. Gow. During March a series of Sunday evening addresses has been given by the Minister, the Rev. Victor Moody on 'Religious Thought in Modern Poets.'

London Essex Church.—The Rev. J. H. Weatherall has entered upon his ministry at Essex Church under happy auspices, and with every prospect of success. An informal welcome was accorded to him and Mrs. Weatherall at the last meeting of the Congregational Society, when several ministers attended and spoke, including the Revs. J. Wood, H. Gow, W. C. Bowie, and W. H. Drummond. The minister of the Kensington Congregational Church was present, and spoke a few cordial words, and the vicar of the parish sent a friendly letter of welcome. The following passage is taken from an address to his new congregation, which Mr. Weatherall has written as a preface to the Annual Report:—"It is our Sunday services which are, as they ought to be, the heart of all our church life; and I entreat the co-operation of all our members to secure a strong, sustained, and numerous support of both of our Sunday services. We have a beautiful church building, the music is good and the services are orderly and reverent, the pulpit is bound by no dead hand of tradition, and it asks for no deference beyond what its veracity and its moral passion may deserve. We must not believe for a moment that our present membership and Sunday attendances are worthy of our history, our equipment, and our significance in the religious life of London. We stand for 'a religion pure of superstition and undefiled by fanaticism, which can face, without illusion, the simple but wonderful facts of human life and the mysterious shadow of death.' We are guardians of a type of religious thought and worship that would be power and illumination to hundreds of souls who do not know us at present; who are, in fact, looking for just such a church as ours, or who have fallen away from any worship because they could not find such a church. Your Committee is doing what it can to make our services better known. But the chief power lies with the ordinary members of the congregation. Bring friends to the services as often as you can, and aim at enrolling them individually as members of the church. Let no natural reticence upon religious things prevent you from testifying how your church helps you in the good life, and may help them. Show its advantage in not being tied to religious forms whose life is gone out of them, and to creeds no longer believable; its freedom in being able to choose only the best from the religious life of the past; its power in the presentation of a pure and uncorrupted Christianity. Make your own attendances at service regular; attend at nights as well as in the mornings, as often as you can. Your life will gain in tranquillity and hope. And the strangers and visitors will profit by you. They cannot think the best of a church if half its pews are empty. And fight against the tendency of our town life to spoil the restfulness of the Sunday by visitings and secularities. People who don't keep Sunday themselves always respect those who do; and if your friends know you have gone to church they may follow you there. And resist the new superstition that public worship is an optional thing. It is optional only in the same sense that breathing is optional. You need not breathe unless you choose, but without breathing you die; and you need not join in public worship unless you choose, but without it your soul will die. For no man on earth is strong enough to be religious in isolation. It will be done to us according to our faith. And faith spreads, not by argument, but by contagion. A vigorous, numerous, and worshipful congregation is the aim we set before us; for the greater glory of God."

Midland Sunday School Association.—On April 10 a meeting of teachers and friends was held at Lye, near Stourbridge. About sixty were present at the evening meeting. Miss E. Rosalind Lee (Stourbridge) gave a paper on 'The Relation Between Church and School,' treating a most important subject in a very practical way. Among the suggestions made were the holding of a class for young people in which the minister could explain the Bible, the religions of the world, and our own particular faith, the meaning of the rites and customs of the Church. The scholars sense of duty to the Church should be most strongly emphasised, he should be told something of the history of his own Church, and given some small duties in it. There was a good discussion, and the meeting was one of the best the Association has held for many years.

Northampton.—Last Sunday was observed as Founders Day at Kettering Road Church, in commemoration of the founders of the congregation of eighty-seven years ago, and of the donors of the present buildings, Sir Philip and Lady Manfield. The Rev. W. C. Hall preached sermons appropriate to the occasion on 'Liberal Christianity' and 'Church Association.' The congregation originally seceded from that worshipping at Doddridge's Old Chapel on Castle Hill. It is interesting to note, as signifying the change that has taken place during the eighty-seven years, that on Sunday afternoon Mr. Hall delivered an address on 'Hinduism' in the Doddridge Memorial School, and that during the week a party of our members gave a dramatic entertainment to the members of Doddridge Church in the schoolroom of the latter. The congregation, which has been sending regular contributions from its War Benevolent Fund to the Commission for Relief in Belgium, has further decided to maintain a bed in the Northampton Wing of the Allies' Hospital at Yvetot. It may be noted also that among the subscribers and members of the congregation are the High Sheriff for the county, Mr. James Manfield, son of the late Sir Philip Manfield, and the Under Sheriff, Councillor James Jackson.

Poole.—Miss Ethel Bayley, who is shortly to be married to the Rev. S. Spenser of Leicester, was the recipient of a presentation from her fellow-teachers in the Unitarian Sunday School on April 3. The Rev. W. B. Matthews presided, and the presentation was made by the Superintendent (Mr. W. E. Stephens).

Stockton-on-Tees.—The Sunday School Anniversary was held on Sunday evening, April 11th, when the service was conducted by Rev. T. P. Spedding of London. In the course of a sermon addressed chiefly to Sunday School workers, Mr. Spedding urged the necessity of the work for the young, and the great opportunity of the teacher in guiding and training the plastic mind of the child. In the afternoon Mr. Spedding inspected the Sunday School in its ordinary work, and afterwards met the teachers for a conference.

South Shields.—The Anniversary Services were held on Easter Sunday, when the Rev. W. H. Lambelle was the preacher. On Easter Tuesday a Public Meeting was held, presided over by Mr. Bolam; addresses were delivered by the Revs. Alfred Hall and W. H. Lambelle and Mr. Stephenson.

South Wales Unitarian Association.—The Quarterly Meetings of the Association were held April 7 and 8 at Allt-y-placa, Cardiganshire, where the Rev. John Davies is minister. There was a good muster of ministers, and large attendances at each of the four sessions. In all there were seven sermons which seemed to be much appreciated by those present. It will be remembered that the venerable pastor tendered his resignation last year on the completion of his fifty years service; but no successor having been appointed he has continued his services at his three chapels ever since. The next meetings will be held in the summer at Brondeifi, Lampeter.

Winnipeg.—A Concert was held at All Souls' Church, Winnipeg, Canada, on March 28 on behalf of THE INQUIRER Belgian Hospital Fund. As a result £20 will be forwarded to the Fund. The money comes as a joint contribution from the Women's Alliance and the Church.

Women's Social Club.—The Sixth Annual Girls' Drill Competition and Display was held at Caxton Hall on Saturday evening, March 28, before a large audience, Mrs. Sydney Martineau being in the chair. The same teams competed as last year. The adjudicator, Miss C. Pinchin, noted a general improvement in the work since the last time she judged the competition in 1911. In the senior competition the Challenge Shield was won by the Essex Church team, and Lady Durning-Lawrence's second prize by Portland Institute; the other teams coming in the following order: Unity Club (Kilburn), Mansford Street Mission, and Bell Street Mission. In the Junior Competition the Shield was won by Portland Institute, and the second place by Essex Church, Mansford Street, Unity Club, and Bell Street (bracketed), and Durning Hall, Limehouse, following fairly closely behind.

We understand that Mrs. Bernard Allen will address the members of the Women's Social Club on her recent visit to the Belgian hospitals in the North of France at Essex Hall on Tuesday the 20th inst. at 3 P.M.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

IN AID OF THE RED CROSS SOCIETY.

Among the precious gifts which have been sent for sale at Christie's for the British Red Cross Society and the Order of the Hospital of St. John of Jerusalem in England are several letters from R. L. Stevenson to Sir Sidney Colvin, in one of which, written at Mentone, he says: "Yesterday I duly worked my hour. The net result was three-and-a-half sentences, which after I had read them with profanation and prayer, I did unhesitatingly delete." There are other letters, also, from Charles Dickens, Thackeray, Swinburne, Wordsworth, Browning, Tennyson, the Duke of Wellington, Florence Nightingale, and other notable men and women. One of the rarest and most interesting items in the long list of literary relics is the first French exercise book used by Charlotte Brontë in Brussels. Here will also be found the first issue of the first edition of the 'Poems by Currer, Ellis, and Acton Bell.' It is Charlotte Brontë's own copy, and contains her autograph signature, "C. Brontë, Manchester, September 21, 1846," on the fly-leaf, with initials in the table of contents identifying the authors of the different poems.

A SURVIVOR OF THE 'GNEISENAU.'

The following extraordinary incident, which shows with what persistency death seems to pass by certain individuals for whom escape seems well-nigh impossible, is narrated in an article in The Cornhill Magazine on the battle of the Falkland Islands, by a Midshipman in H.M.S. 'Carnarvon':—

"One of the officers saved was a first cousin of our admiral's (Stoddart). He is a strong chap and quite a good fellow. He had an extraordinary experience. Half the Gneisenau's men were killed by shell fire alone. He was in an 8.2 turret as second torpedo officer. The turret was knocked out and he was the sole survivor. He then went to a casemate gun, which was also knocked out and practically all the crew killed. He went to a third (another casemate), which was also knocked out, and he was again practically the sole survivor. He went to another gun and the ship was then sunk. He remained in icy water for nearly one and a quarter hours, and was picked up by one of our cutters. He was rather dazed, but cool and collected in the boat. After lying shivering in the bottom of a cutter for half an hour he was hauled up by a bowline into one of his enemy's ships. When he got on board he said, 'I believe I have a first cousin in one of your ships. His name is Stoddart.' Then to find him as admiral in the ship that picked him up! He went into the admiral's quarters, and is now none the worse for his experience. It was a case of the survival of the fittest; and we picked up the pick of the bunch, fine strong men. We shall leave them as prisoners of war at Port Stanley. It was extraordinary to see the lack of animosity against us. We were very cheery saving them. It was a case of 'Buck up, old chap, you're all right,' &c. They said they did not want to fight us. We were glad to save such plucky foemen."

ANTIQUITIES IN SURREY.

The Surrey Archaeological Society reports that a Roman villa, forming a welcome addition to the known Roman remains in this county, has recently been excavated at Compton. At Merton, in the wall of a house which was being pulled down in the premises of Messrs. Liberty, an almost complete Norman arch, obviously a part of the Priory buildings, was recently discovered. Further important discoveries of prehistoric remains have been made at Weybridge, and at Wotton a number of bronze vessels, believed to be almost unique specimens of British water-clocks, were found.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.

THE week has been marked by two fine and informing speeches; one by Mr. Asquith at Newcastle-on-Tyne on Tuesday, the other by Mr. Lloyd George the House of Commons on Wednesday. Mr. Asquith's speech to the Tyneside workers may best be described as the right word in the right place. It was strong, cheery encouragement from beginning to end, though every sentence was weighted with a grave sense of national responsibility. There was not a word of scolding or complaint, and most remarkable of all, not a single reference to the menace of drink. But herein he showed his sound knowledge of character. Willingness, not forced obedience, is the secret of success. The warning against drink has been spoken in ringing accents. Whatever measure of Government control may be necessary, Mr. Asquith's appeal to patriotism and the dignity of labour as national service is the best remedy of all.

THE Prime Minister waived aside the ridiculous suggestion that the Government has only recently become alive to the need of organising manufacture and speeding up the supply of ammunition. So far, he said, the armies in the field have not been hampered by any shortage. He described the statement that it was so as untrue and mischievous. But in the coming months the output must be still greater, not because there had been anything in the nature of general slackness, but on account of the unprecedented scale upon which ammunition on both sides has been, and is being expended. Moreover, recruiting has been brisk among the skilled trades, and caused a shortage of labour which must be supplied by readjustment and central control. This will involve sacrifice of three kinds, which may be summarised thus, limitation of profits, the temporary suspension of restrictive rules and customs, and the provision of reasonable compensation in cases of proved injury or loss.

AMID the cool and closely-knit argument of Mr. Asquith's speech there was one illuminating fact which will appeal to the imagination of the country. No less than 217,000 coal miners have enlisted since the war began, 20 per cent of the total number, and nearly 50 per cent of the miners of military age.

There has been [he said] an influx not to fill, but to help to fill, the gaps. There has been an influx of some 70,000 men from other industries, many of them, of course, quite inexperienced and unskilled, and the shortage of men is still 14 per cent on the former numbers. The result, and it is not surprising, is a diminution of about 12 per cent per month on the normal output, while the demand for coal has, of course, in consequence of the war, risen above the normal level. These are very remarkable figures, and I would venture, if I may, in passing to appeal to the miners who remain in the pits to rival the patriotism of their fellows who have gone or who are going to the front by regularity of attendance, and if possible, by increased output. They are serving their country, let them remember, just as well at the coal face in Northumberland or Durham as if they were lying in the trenches in Flanders or in France.

MR. LLOYD GEORGE's speech in the House of Commons on Wednesday proved to be a most useful supplement to that of the Prime Minister. He announced that we had at the present moment an army of 750,000 men on active service in France, thoroughly well equipped at all points. But the surprise of the war, for the Germans no less than for ourselves, had been the tremendous expenditure of ammunition, especially of high explosives. In a fortnight in and around Neuve Chapelle almost as much ammunition was spent by our artillery as during the whole two and three-quarter years of the Boer War, and yet there was a reserve at present. The amount of ammunition required depended on the policy adopted at the front, and when the time came for increasing the armies, and the policy must be more aggressive, the amount of ammunition required would enormously increase. The lines on which the Government had been working during the past few weeks were due not to any deficiency at present, but to the needs of the near future.

MR. LLOYD GEORGE proceeded to give some statistics illustrating the remarkable increase in our output of ammunition. In September there was a considerable increase over the output in August, and there was an increase in August over July. Take the figure of 20 as representing the output in September. By October it went up to 90. In November it was 90 again, because new machinery which had been laid down, did not come into operation until a month later. In December it went up to 156, January 186, February 256, and March 388. That was purely for artillery. Comparing March with September, therefore, the output was multiplied 19 fold, and he had no hesitation in saying that in April the increase would correspond to the increase that had taken place in the preceding months.

In view of these remarkable figures we hope that timid people will not be unduly depressed by the carping and almost pessimistic tone of a section of the press. It is a little difficult to understand its motive, for it does not suggest a change of Government, and it always stops short of attacking the Minister for War, who has such a large share of responsibility for everything that is done. Does it mean that the omniscient journalist, who, of course, foresaw all the difficulties of the war, is getting a little restive in his obscurity, or growing surly under an attack of nerves? Or is it that the party organs find existence rather dull without the tonic of grumbling and abuse? Or may we hazard the suggestion that the small knot of conscriptionists, finding that things are going badly with their campaign, is using the anxious mood of the country as a stalking horse for their nostrum of compulsory service. Be that as it may, the conduct of affairs is in the hands of strong men, who have always spoken to the country with a full sense of the difficulty and the seriousness of the conflict in which we are engaged. If there has ever been a mood of flashy optimism, or a tendency to believe in a short and easy war, it has been due chiefly to the Press, with its placards and headlines, and the prominence which it has given to travellers' tales about the condition of things in Germany.

It is rather refreshing to find an admission in the daily press that the action of the Censors may sometimes be guided by political wisdom or common sense. The London Correspondent of The Manchester Guardian explains that some of the things which fail to pass the Press Bureau, are considered to be diplomatically indiscreet, because they might possibly make trouble or cause ill-feeling between us and neutral nations, or between us and our Allies. "Even the censoring of the German wireless is explained on this ground. A passage in the German wireless which effectively villified or libelled the French or the Russians might quite likely be cut out by our Censor. But he would not cut out anything offensive to this country. The German wireless can say anything it likes about us as far as the Censor is concerned." There have been some sharp complaints lately that information, which appears in the newspapers of neutral countries, is not allowed to be published here. In many cases the information is probably misleading or exaggerated, or it may have no basis in fact at all. The English Censor cannot, of course, pass it unless he is prepared to endorse it. The fact that he refuses his endorsement to picturesque articles or sensational rumours in the foreign press is a signal to the public that these things are to be viewed with suspicion. For the rest it is no part of his business to allow his hand to be forced in this way into an official avowal where there are still good reasons for silence or reserve. In spite of the lavish amount of criticism which it has received, and the failings which are inseparable from all things human, we see no reason to believe that the Press Bureau has ever been guided by a desire to hoodwink the public or to suppress unwelcome intelligence or to hamper and vex the newspapers in their work.

WE quite expected that some of our readers would disagree with our policy of discouraging what seems to us to be premature talk about the terms of peace. At the present moment such terms would have to be so vague and abstract as to lose all their practical value, or in their rigour they must go far beyond anything we hope to obtain, even when Germany admits that she has been beaten in the War. But for the most part the discussion ranges through the safe territory of abstractions, and fails to come to close quarters with the hundred questions of practical politics which must come up for settlement. What is to be the fate of Constantinople and the future of the German Colonies? How is Belgium to be restored, and who is to pay the bill? What are the claims of France in money and territory? Shall we demand Heligoland and neutralise the Kiel Canal as a measure of protection for the future? Is Germany to give us full compensation for the destruction of our merchant shipping? These are only specimens of the questions which will have to be decided. If the war ends in a stalemate, they will be settled in a spirit of compromise. If the Allies win a decisive victory they will be able to face all these problems in a much firmer and more comprehensive way. Moreover, we cannot put forward any scheme of peace at all without full consultation with our Allies, and that at the present moment is impossible.

* * *

MR. ROOSEVELT has sent a very blunt and outspoken letter in criticism of an organisation called "The Women's Party for a Constructive Peace for America." Part of it deals with American problems like the attitude of President Wilson, and the whole is couched in the vigorous and uncompromising style with which we are familiar; but it says many things in a blunt and breezy fashion, which the framers of abstract schemes of peace and conciliation would do well to lay to heart. "I assume, of course," he writes, "that you are for peace in reality, and not merely for the name of peace, and that you are for peace based on justice and right, and not for a peace that consecrates successful wrong, for the peace that consecrates wrong may be actually worse than war."

* * *

THE following passage contains the kernel of Mr. Roosevelt's indictment. It tears to shreds every plea for the discussion of peace based upon agreements to keep silent about the things which really matter and are the determining factors in the whole situation. We do not wish to impugn the motives of those who accept these agreements of silence. To most people they are quite futile, for ourselves they would be deeply insincere.

Above all [he says] it is base and evil to clamour for peace in the abstract when silence is kept about the concrete and hideous wrongs done to humanity at this very moment. Belgium has been trampled into bloody mire; frightful wrongs have been committed upon men, women, and children in Belgium. The Belgians have fought valiantly against their oppressors; yet this paper you enclose does not contain one protest against the commission of such wrongs as have been committed on Belgium, and does denounce war in such a fashion as to include in the condemnation the Belgians just as much as the oppressors of Belgium. There is nothing easier, there is nothing on the whole, less worth while entering into, than vague, hysterical demands for right in the abstract, coupled with an unworthy and timid refusal even to allude to the frightful wrongs that are at this moment being committed in the concrete. The Congressmen that pass resolutions against war and in favour of peace in the abstract, do not do one particle of good, because their resolutions are utterly meaningless, and must be utterly meaningless, unless they are reduced to concrete cases.

In our comments last week upon the interview which an enterprising German-American journalist has had with the Pope, we ventured to throw some doubt upon its value as a reflection of the mind of the Vatican. Upon whatever basis of fact it may rest it was too obviously written with a motive not to share the general discredit of the whole German press campaign. In any case, Vatican circles seem to be alive to the fact that an indiscretion has been committed which needs to be toned down or explained away. Meanwhile, Mr. Karl von Wiegand is congratulating himself upon his success in bringing off a clever journalistic coup, and no doubt also upon the subtlety with which he plays the German game in high places.

A GERMAN APOLOGIST.

MANY people in our own country are sincerely anxious to understand the attitude of high-minded Germans upon some of the central problems of the war. With many of them we have co-operated in common work for brotherhood and goodwill. We have welcomed them as friends here. We have been received by them as honoured guests, whose opinions were worthy of all consideration and respect, when we have visited Germany. Among them none has stood higher in our regard than Dr. Spiecker, the chairman of the German Council for the promotion of Anglo-German friendship. Many of our readers will remember his visit to London a few years ago, and the public impression of sincerity and high-mindedness which he made on that occasion. If any one can bridge the gulf in moral judgment, which has produced such a strong feeling of estrangement, he ought to be able to do it. If there is any feeling in Germany, which can form a basis for mutual understanding upon the bitter wrongs of Belgium and the reparation which is due to her, it is from a man who stands so high in our esteem as Dr. Spiecker that we may expect to hear of it.

It is, accordingly, with no little regret that we observe that Dr. Spiecker, and those whom he represents, can refer to the German outrage upon Belgium without a trace of compunction. A long communication from him in explanation and defence of the German attitude appears in the current number of Goodwill. It is in some respects the best and most plausible statement of the German case from the purely civilian point of view which we have seen, though the picture of Russian hordes violating the lamb-like innocence of her neighbour is a little overdone. But what about Belgium? Dr. Spiecker must know that it is to this part of his apologia that we shall turn most eagerly.

England [he says] claimed the neutrality of Belgium to be respected by Germany. Our Government was honest enough to declare that this was impossible, because they knew that France would avail herself of the free passage through Belgium in order to attack Germany on the Western frontier of Rhenish Prussia, where there were no fortresses of similar strength, such as Metz and Strassburg in Alsace-Lorraine. Without knowing at that time what we know to-day about England's relation to Belgium, we saw the British Government endeavouring to push Germany—attacked by Russia—against the fearful fences of Verdun, Toul, and Belfort, and the uninterrupted line of forts and bulwarks in between those strongholds! Germany offered to Belgium just the same as to Luxemburg: reimbursement of all and every damage done, service rendered and goods claimed during the passage of the German troops.

Dr. Spiecker is apparently quite unaware of the cool effrontery of this statement. A burglarious threat to a neutral country, demanding the use of its territory for military purposes against its will, seems to him to be perfectly in accord with civilised usage and the obligations of honour. In other words Germany had a perfect right to annex everything she required in Belgium as part of her military machine and to coerce her by fear into taking sides against France. Dr. Spiecker has no word of admiration for the courage with which this base proposal was refused. But he has still another stone for us in his wallet.

We thought [he continues] at that time that Belgium had to choose between Germany and France, and we did not know that she had chosen already, that she herself had broken her neutrality by having made as early as 1906 military arrangements with the military authorities of Great Britain, arrangements which had been developed ever since 1906 into a perfect understanding on the military dispositions of Belgian and British troops in Belgium as shown in geographical cards of Belgium printed in 1914 in English, and found in the luggage of British officers found dead on the battlefield.

Now what does this terrific charge that Belgium had already surrendered her neutrality amount to? Simply this, that in view of the growing menace of Germany on her Eastern frontier she determined not to be caught unawares, and made plans for self-defence in case of unwarrantable attack. Belgium has no desire to become a German province. It would be contrary to our interests that she should fall into German hands. A mutual compact to prevent such a catastrophe has nothing aggressive about it, and is in no sense a breach of the strictest obligations of neutrality. If the menace had come from our side, and Belgium had feared bombardment by our fleet, Germany would not have hesitated to take similar steps for her protection, and we should have had no legitimate ground of complaint. Dr. Spiecker has said the best that can be said for his country in this sorry business, and the best is very bad.

Underlying the whole of this statement in defence of Germany there is the assumption that the Teuton has the right to rule in Europe. The English are cousins, and stand within the sacred pale of civilisation, if they behave themselves; but Slavs and Frenchmen are the enemy. It is this perverted view of national rights and international friendships which has to be banished before there can be peace. Bigness is not greatness in Germany or anywhere else, and bumptious pretensions are no title to respect. Germany must rid herself of her boastful contempt for everything that is not of her blood and pattern; she must cease to think of Slavs simply as barbarian hordes, and neutral countries as military assets for herself; she must learn to respect the civilisation of France, so much more ancient, in many respects so much richer than her own; she must lay aside her hatred of England, who has called such a sharp "halt" to her mad career of ambition; and, last and hardest task of all, she must honour the little country she has most deeply wronged; or the things which have made her great in the past will slip from her grasp. We are dealing here not with counsels of political prudence, but with laws of life, which in the slow movement of history are more powerful than armies. In the certainty of their judgments they apply equally to us all.

We are anxious, like other sensible people, to understand the German state of mind. We can make many allowances for exaggerated statements and injured feelings about ourselves. But along the lines of Dr. Spiecker's explanation about Belgium, which we doubt not is accepted by a large number of his countrymen, we can find no encouragement for further discussion. We are simply brought to a dead stop against a moral impasse.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

ENGLAND AND EUROPE.

"SECURE in our insular position and satisfied with our inheritance of freedom, we listen perhaps too readily to the counsels of the selfish policy, which bids us attend to our own interests and take no part in the effort to promote good government and aid social progress abroad. But is it possible for any one member of the great European family so completely to separate itself from all the rest? If freedom perishes on the Continent, what will become of it among ourselves? What will become of our trade and commerce—even admitting these to be the only interests with which our foreign policy has any concern—should an absolute despotism establish its crushing rule over the whole of Europe?....Doubtless we are right in checking the meddlesome and pugnacious propensities which have so often heretofore involved us in unavailing and ruinous warfare, but there is a point where indifference ceases to be sound or even pacific policy, and becomes ungenerous and inhuman. We must take care that the economical doctrine of non-interference does not extinguish in us all sympathy for the oppressed and all enthusiasm for the principle of truth and right."—From a Sermon by John James Tayler, December 29, 1850.

THE PRICE OF PEACE.

"EVERY Christian believes, that universal peace, cemented by the spirit of brotherhood, is the ultimate destiny of the human race and the issue to which all true civilisation tends. But hard conditions are attached by Providence to our choicest blessings. We must not prematurely maim the indispensable process in vainly forestalling the result. We must not mistake the distant visions of a prophetic spirit for the stern necessities of our actual world. The instinct of self-defence is implanted in us by God. We must distinguish between the arm that assails and the arm that defends human rights. The hosts that would lay waste our civilisation are not to be confounded with those that are embattled to preserve and perpetuate it. It is false humanity, from the dread of momentary suffering, to prefer the slow consuming malady, which cherishes the seeds of future strife, to the brief agony of conflict which may be the necessary preliminary of a safe and lasting peace."—From a Sermon by John James Tayler, December 29, 1850.

AND must we battle yet? Must we,

Who bear the tender name Divine,
Still barter life for victory,

Still glory in the crimson sign?
The Crucified between us stands,
And lifts on high his wounded hands.

Lord, we are weak and wilful yet,

The fault is in our clouded eyes;
But thou, through anguish and regret,

Dost make thy faithless children wise;
Through wrong, through hate, thou dost approve

The far-off victories of love.

And so from out the heart of strife,

Diviner echoes peal and thrill;
The scorned delights, the lavished life,

The pain that serves a nation's will;
Thy comfort stills the mourner's cries
And love is crowned by sacrifice.

A. C. BENSON.

O MOST loving Father, who willest us to give thanks for all things, to dread nothing but the loss of thee, and to cast all our care on thee who carest for us; preserve us from faithless fears and worldly anxieties, and grant that no clouds of this mortal life may hide from us the light of that love which is immortal. Amen.

OUR VISIT TO THE BEL- GIAN HOSPITALS.

II.

It required great pertinacity to obtain permission to cross the Channel by the route we wanted, but it required very much more to be permitted to go nearer to the scene of war. I should not like to say how many hours were spent in going from bureau to bureau, in explaining and in telegraphing to still higher authorities, and in waiting for their replies. Still, in time, it was done, and armed with the necessary papers we set off by train, as far as the train would take us. We arrived at a picturesque little town, where ordinary life still went on, where the shops were quite gay, and the people went to and fro as usual. But the menace of war was over all, and never for a moment could we forget it. One day as we sat at breakfast we saw a column of soldiers just off to the trenches, marching through the town with banners flying, bands playing, and bayonets gleaming in the sun. Later in the day we passed them. They were resting by the roadside eating their dinner, dusty, and with no glamour about them. The bands had gone back, and it was stern business they were about. We wondered how many would return. This town, too, is full of hospitals, both French and Belgian. We visited many, but I will only now speak of the three in which we were specially interested. The first was in a large private house, cleverly adapted, and serving its purpose well in spite of many drawbacks. The head doctor is an exceptionally clever surgeon, and here are brought the most serious cases for operations. The wards were pleasantly arranged; Belgian ladies were in charge as nurses, and had done wonders with very scanty materials to make the rooms cheerful. All the patients were in bed, as directly they can be moved they are sent off to a convalescent ship to complete their recovery, and to make room for more urgent cases. There is a workmanlike operating room, many of the fittings of which we have sent out; and there is an X-ray apparatus in the fitting up of which we have also helped.

The next hospital was a little way out in the country, and was housed in a school building. The bulk of the patients were typhoid and typhus cases. Of course, in this hospital we had to be content with a short inspection of the wards, and talking to the patients was not desirable, and in the case of the typhus ward, a very brief inspection through an open door was all that was permitted. The doctor in charge was a delightfully warm-hearted man, and made us quite embarrassed by his reiterated thanks. "Before the English helped us we had nothing, nothing—now see!" and he triumphantly pointed out the various accessories we had sent him. He told us that the mortality in his hospital in the early days was high owing to the impossibility of obtaining what was necessary to nurse the patients properly. Now it was as low as 10 per cent, and this result he attributed to all the comforts and medical accessories which the English had sent. "I assure you, madame," he said "that the gifts that have come to us have been the direct means of saving life. You have that satisfaction in return for your work, a satisfaction which we share in doing our work among the patients, and if it gives you the happiness which we feel in our work, you are well repaid." This is but another instance of the spirit of gratitude that we found everywhere.

At the third hospital, the convalescent ship, we found most of the patients dressed and able to get about the deck. There are two young Belgian girls here acting as nurses, and they have plenty to do. The ship is moored in a basin so far away from the town that visitors are a very rare occurrence, and created quite an excitement. They were very thankful for some games we had for them, as time hangs heavily on the hands of men well enough to be up and about. After much hesitation the two nurses took me aside and whispered that, after all we had done, there was one thing they longed for: "With a gramophone this would be Paradise," they said. We were much amused, and though we made no promises we said we would remember their request. On my return home, I mentioned this incident to a friend, and he at once promised to give me a gramophone with a set of records specially chosen for Belgian soldiers. Before long it will be on its way to them.

I must now give a short account of one most interesting day. We started out in a motor ambulance in the morning to drive towards the front to visit two hospitals which are being constructed as near as a hospital dare be to the firing line. It was a long, straight road, white with dust that morning, bordered with trees with just a suggestion of green on their dark boughs. A canal runs by the side of the road, and on it lay strings of barges, some full of cargo, but mostly patiently waiting in hope for the Belgian waterways to be once more open to them. Every mile or two a sentry stopped us, and we had to produce our laissez passer, and satisfy an inquisitive officer that we were on legitimate business. The road was thronged with military motors, cars, and vans, every one of which is armed with a special pass, and everywhere are signs that we are in the war zone. Yet in the villages there were plenty of women and children still left, and a certain semblance of ordinary life going on. The first hospital we visited is housed in a large hotel, around which many large wooden pavilions are being erected. When complete it will contain about 1,300 beds. The wounded can be brought here in half an hour from the trenches; while we were there an ambulance arrived full of men who had just been wounded in the firing line. Many of the men would never live to travel further; but the prompt and skilled attention they can receive here gives them a chance to recover. The whole place is full of the wonderful personality of its great director, who has his Anglo-Belgian Committee in London, and whose guests we were for the visit. We had not had anything to do with the hospital before, as it has its own resources; but it was intensely interesting to see what one man can accomplish.

Of course, all forms of work at such a place must be interesting. I should like to mention one incident in passing, though it has no connection with the work of our Fund. We had been across the dunes to visit a Belgian officer, and were hailed by an English lady. She had recognised me as an Englishwoman, and saw a chance of help. Her work was to carry refugees from the bombarded villages to a place of safety a little way off. "For the most part they prefer to accept death rather than fly to the unknown," she said. Especially, she brought expectant mothers to her small maternity home, and kept them till their babies were born, and the mothers strong again. Working under the Belgian military authorities, she had great opportunity for service, but needed a small comfortable car to carry the mothers in, and a motor ambulance for other sick. I am glad to say I have already had a car given me for her, and have hopes of the ambulance, but if any one cares to send me clothes for the babies I will gladly forward them.

But to return to our hospitals. The last we visited that day had sprung up in a fortnight. Built on beautiful sand, the wooden pavilions, each containing twenty-six beds, could be put together in eight hours, and taken to pieces in the same time. This hospital will follow the advance, when it comes. It has a fine surgeon at its head, working hard to make his hospital efficient, while observing the greatest economy; and I believe that here we can be of great help. There will be 450 beds, and as the hospital is very near the army, there will be a great number passing through, for patients will be sent further back as soon as they can travel with safety. This will mean an enormous consumption of clothes, dressings, &c. A little country house has been turned into the central office with an operating theatre, and X-ray room. The stable has become a very practical kitchen, while outhouses have been converted into storerooms, orderly rooms, sterilising rooms for clothes, and all the necessary paraphernalia of a modern hospital.

We had now visited all the hospitals we had come to see, so the next day we permitted ourselves to visit five of the English voluntary hospitals on the coast, and, naturally, after all the makeshift arrangements we had seen they seemed quite palatial. They are all housed in fine villas, with good rooms, and the air blowing off the North Sea is magnificent. Our visit was now over, and we must go home. We returned to our starting place, and by this time many of the hospitals had prepared the lists of things they were needing. So we spent a strenuous and very happy day packing and distributing what we had in the store already, and in saying good-bye to all the friends we had made in that short visit. After the usual tiresome formalities we got our permit to depart, and crossed the Channel again under the escort of a destroyer.

We are only at the beginning of much of this work. When the advance comes the number of wounded is likely to be great. Our visit has proved beyond all doubt that our money and goods are going where they are urgently needed, and that no one else is doing just this work. It is a privilege to help such men as we found the medical staffs of the hospitals to be. They are giving their time, their strength, their great skill to help their wounded and sick countrymen. It is our part to see that they are not hampered in their work by any lack of material.

INTERNATIONAL ETHICS.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—After reading the letter of Mr. Vizard in your issue of the 17th inst. I turned up your issue of the 10th that I might read the paper of Mr. Chancellor, and I venture to trouble you with this letter because I think the questions they raise are questions about which we had better not talk just now. The questions that concern us are mainly two (1) How are we to win this war? This is a question for the soldiers; and all we need say about it is that it will hardly come to unconditional surrender and dictating terms at Berlin. And (2) What proposals are we to make to our enemies when they ask for peace?

Mr. Chancellor's and Mr. Vizard's letters seem to obscure both points, and to indicate impossible conditions. Mr. Chancellor wrote on the value of nationality, and we can all agree with him. He, unfortunately, but quite innocently, took from Germany his illustrations of "the spirit that too often vitiates patriotism and turns it from a great and ennobling ideal into a curse." How does his paper help us to answer our questions? Mr. Vizard seizes on the illustrations, and implicitly at least, charges the whole German nation with holding the views of Treitschke and Bernhardt, and "with paganism, or rather barbarism, with a moral veneer." Can that help us?

The Germans think, or profess to think, that they are fighting a war of defence, and they so far agree with us that they desire a peace that will be a real peace, and put an end to all future wars of attack or defence. Can we not take advantage of this attitude of mind which must be accentuated as the war drags on?

In the first place I would refer your readers to Bernhardt himself as quoted for us by the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas. Bernhardt writes: "The life of the individual citizen is valuable only when it is consciously and actively employed for the attainment of great ends. The same holds good of nations. They are, as it were, personalities in the framework of collective humanity." How Bernhardt can reconcile this with much of his other writing I do not know; but with this reconciliation I am not concerned. I would only say that if Bernhardt can write thus, giving voice at least to some minor part of himself, and possibly to some minority of the German nation, are we to believe, and still less, to insist that the quotations your correspondents give represent the views of the German nation, or even of a majority of them; and if by bad luck they do, does Mr. Vizard think that we shall ever get them to admit that they are wrong, and prepared to enter into "an agreement to refer all disputes to arbitration and abide by the award given"? Would not the outcry of the dominant party in Germany be so loud at any such suggestion that the minority would be entirely overborne and the war be indefinitely prolonged?

But suppose we ask them to agree to appoint an international tribunal, not for the purpose of the coming peace, but appointed after the peace by all the great nations, including themselves, and before the disputes of the future arise, and at the same time to agree not to begin war until such a tribunal has investigated and reported on the cause of the quarrel, and made suggestions for settlement. It should also be part of the agreement that no party to the quarrel should be bound by the decision unless it approved itself to them, and all should be as free to act after the report as they were before the quarrel arose; and that the tribunal should have a year to make its report. A delay of twelve months would thus be interposed to every quarrel. Is not this kind of proposal the sort of thing the Germans might accept, and, though the time has not come for making it as we have got "to win" the war first, should we not do better in discussing it, or similar propositions, instead of pointing out to the Germans how wicked they are, and putting forward views to which they will certainly never willingly give an assent?

You will, of course, have recognised, Mr. Editor, that the proposal is not mine. It has been discussed, I think, by more than one publicist, and it is, I believe, one that might give us peace if accepted, and be a step in the direction of the ideals which Mr. Chancellor and Mr. Vizard contemplate. But it seems to me that the question: What are our terms? will be put to us before long, and discussion of them beforehand cannot but help to clear our minds and assist us to give an answer. To tell our adversaries that they are pagans, or barbarians with a veneer, does not.—Yours, &c.

TERMS OF PEACE.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—I regret the tone which you take up in THE INQUIRER of the 17th inst., where you endorse the warning of Dr. Holland Rose against talking of peace. Not that I am for making peace now, and leaving the Germans in possession of Belgium. I doubt if any one wants that. But I think we ought to make up our minds, and to let the public know what are the general principles on which we should be prepared to conclude peace—leaving the details, of course, to be settled as events point out. We owe it not only to our enemies, but to our soldiers and the public, to have some idea what we are fighting for. Do you say: To crush the Germans? We cannot annihilate a nation of sixty millions. And which would be most likely to lead to a lasting peace? The attitude of mind which says: "We are ready to discuss reasonable terms of peace with you"; or that which says: "We do not mean to lay down our arms till we have annihilated you, and given you cause to hate us"? I have no doubt Bismarck was in favour of secret diplomacy. But I do not think his example is one for a free nation to follow. Dr. Holland Rose thinks it is useless for neutral nations to attempt to mediate. Yet there is an old saying that lookers-on see most of the game; and I think neutral nations would be better able than either English, French, Russians, or Germans, to judge what terms would be just to all parties.—Yours, &c.,

M. C. MARTINEAU.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

THE STORY OF DANTE.

V.—THE INFERNO AND THE PURGATORIO.

It was natural that Dante, the traveller and dreamer, should make his great poem a dream-journey. It is also an Easter pilgrimage which he undertakes in order to learn penitence, and become pure in heart, that he may once more see the wondrous vision of Heaven.

The dream begins on the eve of Good Friday, and the journey is supposed to last a week. Full of sleep, Dante enters a dark wood, where he loses his way, and spends a night in fear and misery. He is almost in despair when he is met by a kind guide whom Beatrice, in her compassion, has sent to help him and bring him to her. This is the spirit of Virgil, the Roman poet, to Dante the one great poet of the past, whom he had loved and followed all his life. Virgil cannot take Dante the nearest way to the light of Heaven. They must first visit the Inferno that Dante may learn from what he sees and hears there to know what is ugly and what is beautiful, what is evil and what is good. He must learn to see the inside of things, and comprehend the unseen. At the gate Dante is afraid to enter upon the difficult and painful way; but when he learns that it is Beatrice herself who has sent Virgil to guide him, his fainting courage revives, and he trusts himself to be led as a lost child is led home.

Inside the gate is a river across which the waiting spirits are ferried in a boat. Beyond the river Virgil and Dante go down, down to a dark place "where there is nought that shines," shut out from the light of the sun by day, and from the stars at night. Here in "the black air" are those who will not learn, who are not ashamed, who are only sorry for themselves, and for the misery of their own punishment. Everything about them is ugly or dreary, like the evil to which they cling. There are moaning winds, dark rocks, evil-smelling bogs, hot sands, steep precipices, and ice. The angry people are stuck in a bog, smiting and hurting each other. The sullen are below the water fixed in the slime beneath. They say: "Sullen were we in the sweet air, that is gladdened by the sun, carrying lazy smoke within our hearts. Now lie we sullen here in the black mire." And these words gurgle in their throats, whilst from their sighs rise bubbles to the surface of the water.

Virgil and Dante are ferried across this bog in a boat, and only Dante makes the boat sink deeper with his weight. As they descend a shingly bank Dante is the only one beneath whose feet the stones move. Dante, too, the one living man, feels the weight of shame at what he sees, and learns much as he journeys on. Once, in great danger, Virgil carries him away into safety "as a mother takes her child and flies to escape fire, caring more for him than for herself." So often did this gentle guide save him in difficulty that Dante would turn to him with "trust, as a little child runs to his mother when frightened or in trouble." But he grieved more and more over what he saw, and longed more and more to get back to the light and to the life where men may, at least, be sorry and try to do better.

It is Easter morning when Virgil and Dante at last climb out from the darkness of the lower world into the light of the stars. They find themselves on the shore of an island which rises up like a mountain into the clear pure air of dawn. Dante's eyes and heart have been distressed by the dead air of the underworld; but now delight is restored to his eyes by "the sweet hue of orient sapphire in which the planet Venus is making the whole East to laugh." He is taken by Virgil to the margin of the sea where the rushes grow. His face is bathed in dew from the grass to cleanse him from stains of the lower world, and he is guided with rushes as a sign of humility. As they gaze over the ocean to the sunrise, a light comes towards them on the water, white wings appear, and they see an angel bringing a boat to shore with his wings for sails. In this boat are the spirits of the penitent who have come to climb the Mount of Purgatory. Dante recognises one of his old friends, a singer, and begs him to sing once more his favourite songs of love. The spirits are surprised at Dante's shadow, and are interested to hear of his journey up the mountain whilst he is still alive. He hears more songs and anthems, and sees more angels, one on each terrace on the way up the mountain. These terraces are occupied by different spirits bearing different punishments, and learning different lessons. The proud are willingly carrying heavy loads, bowed down with the weight, sorry for their past folly, and learning to be humble. The angry are living without complaint in a cloud of smoke, "in sorrow untying the knot of anger," getting rid of the stifling fumes in their own hearts. The greedy are seen standing beneath a tree and lifting up their hands to the fruit they cannot reach, "crying out like spoilt and greedy children." Their punishment is to be always hungry and thirsty. But they are all learning to turn away from the wrong and "set their minds on doing good." As each spirit, in turn, learns his lesson, he passes up to another terrace, all the other spirits rejoicing with him, and singing in thanksgiving. L. H.

DRINK AND THE WAR.

TO THE MEMBERS OF UNITARIAN AND OTHER LIBERAL RELIGIOUS CHURCHES.

WE feel sure that our friends and fellow members of our churches will desire to bear their full share with the members of other churches, and indeed with the nation at large in helping by every means in their power the practice of temperance. There is an all but universal opinion that the use of strong drink is impairing the national efficiency in naval, military, and industrial affairs, and the nation more than ever before requires its efficiency to be maintained at the highest level. Some of us will probably consider that the most effective way of achieving this is to follow the example of his Majesty the King; but to many of us there seems to be more than merely personal effort necessary. When a great enemy is at our gates we sink our individuality and submit to a State control which would at other times be intolerable. This is a time of great emotions when great things are possible to us. Cannot we put aside our individual views and take really drastic steps as a nation to combat this great enemy at home?

If after the war is over we wish to go back to things as they are now there is nothing to prevent our doing so. But is it too much to hope that a state of affairs so much better than we have ever known may result from the sacrifice the nation is asked to bear, and so in this way also the horrors and misery of this stupendous struggle will not have been in vain.

When our young men are so heroically offering their lives in the service of their country and of righteousness and freedom, we shall surely be only too eager to further their efforts by making the infinitely smaller sacrifice that is now asked of us.

NATIONAL UNITARIAN TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

MANIFESTO TO THE CHURCHES.

SINCE the beginning of the war our most distinguished generals have laid great stress on the necessity, for our soldiers, of abstinence from intoxicating liquor; and some of our scientific men have enforced the plea by insisting on the established fact that efficiency is reduced to a serious extent by indulging in even small quantities of alcohol. Recently evidence has been produced that the efficiency of the workmen engaged in the manufacture of war material has been reduced by indulgence in drink to an extent which imperils our success in the war. It may be that the evil, in any marked degree, affects only a very small proportion of our workmen; but the irregularity of a small number affects the efficiency of the whole, as the absence of a pinion destroys the efficiency of a machine. At all events, the evil has been sufficiently serious to induce our King to forbid the use of alcoholic beverages in his household during the continuance of the war, thus taking upon himself the self-denial which, in the interests of the country, it seems desirable to impose on the poorest labourer. In these circumstances would it not be well for us all to follow the same rule? Our doing so would not only furnish a strengthening example for those who are exposed to what is undoubtedly a severe temptation, and prove that we are not willing to impose on others what we decline for ourselves, but would also liberate funds which might be better spent in relieving the terrible suffering which the war entails.

We venture, therefore, to appeal to the members of our churches to unite in observing complete abstinence from alcoholic drinks during the period of the war, and so helping to maintain the high resolve of the nation in meeting this terrible crisis in its fortunes.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION MOTOR AMBULANCE FUND.

THE presentation of the motor ambulance will take place at Essex Hall on Sunday, May 2, at 3.30 P.M. The service will be conducted by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A. The ambulance will be presented to the British Red Cross Society by Mr. Ion Pritchard, President of the Sunday School Association; and afterwards there will be a parade in Essex Street with the ambulance. An invitation has been sent to the ministers, to the officers, teachers, and scholars of our schools, the young people of our congregations, and to all who have so kindly given their help. It is hoped that there will be a good muster from the schools in London, and that others may like to send representatives. Boys' Brigades, Girls' Brigades, and Scouts should wear uniform.

THE CONGRESS OF RELIGIOUS LIBERALS AT PHILADELPHIA.

THE Fifth Congress of the National Federation of Religious Liberals, which was held at Philadelphia recently, is said to have been one of the best yet organised by this Association. It was at Philadelphia, as Dr. Wendte points out in his summary of the proceedings in The Christian Register, in the Friends' Meeting House on Race Street where the gatherings were held last month, that the Federation was started, and its first meeting called in 1908. This was shortly after Universalist, Unitarian, and other Liberal religious bodies were refused fellowship in the newly formed Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, and Dr. Charles W. Eliot, Dr. Edward Everett Hale, and other delegates were turned away from it. The inspiring spirit of the new movement of religious fellowship was the late Henry M. Wilbur, Secretary of the Advancement Committee of the Society of Liberal Friends—a man of rare gifts and broad sympathies—and the first session was held under his presidency. Catholic, Protestant, Jewish, and other speakers participated in the proceedings, and over a thousand members were enrolled. Since that time four Congresses have been held in Philadelphia, New York City, Rochester, N.Y., and now in Philadelphia once more. The Federation was fortunate in securing as its chairman for the week, and later, by election, as its permanent President, Prof. Jesse H.

Holmes of Swarthmore College, a prominent member of the body of Liberal Friends, and a close friend and worthy successor of Henry Wilbur.

The report of the proceedings is not completed in the latest number of The Christian Register which has come to hand; but sufficient details are given to show that the meetings were very successful, in spite of the allusions of Mr. Sunday, the Revivalist, who has recently been electrifying the atmosphere of Philadelphia, to the "smallness" of the audiences at the Quaker Meeting House. The speaking was on a high level, and the subjects dealt with covered a wide range, and were of a character particularly significant and of absorbing interest at the present time. It would, indeed, be impossible for men like Dr. Dole, Dr. Crothers, Mr. Edwin D. Mead, Dr. S. A. Eliot, and Prof. Franz Boaz, the anthropologist—to mention a few names that will be familiar to our readers—to address audiences of men and women united in the common endeavour for human advancement on "The Higher Patriotism," "International Wars and World Peace," and "The Race Problem," at such a moment without stimulating thought and kindling hopes for the future in an unusual degree.

DR. CROTHERS ON RATIONAL PATRIOTISM.

Referring to the war, Dr. Crothers showed how the efforts of mankind at the present time to keep the peace of the world had failed. Commercial prudence, statesmanship, armed preparations for war, and even superior virtue had for the time failed. "To keep the peace," he said, "we need to reconsider our piety and our patriotism, and arrive at larger and clearer conceptions. We need a more intellectual, clear-sighted, rational religion in place of the old superstitious and mistaken ideas which have broken down so disastrously. We need a more rational patriotism in place of the old superstitious notion of it, which inevitably leads to war. The oldest religion of men was animism, and it survives in the creeds of men to-day. Kipling's 'Truce of the Bear' is the purest animism. Such a religion generates suspicion and hatred between nations and peoples. Justice to a nation demands that you should not consider it as a being who hates or can be hated. A nation is a vast aggregation of people with varying sentiments and desires. It is not engaged in hating its fellow-men; it does not lie awake planning aggression upon them. I love my country, but that does not lead me to hate any other country. America is neutral to-day because, made up of two score nationalities, it becomes us to live together in peace at home and good will to all nations abroad. To break this neutrality for the sake of any nation would mean civil war. Let us pray for a nobler religion, and a more exalted and inclusive patriotism."

DEMOCRACY AND PEACE.

Mr. Edwin D. Mead, director of the World Peace Foundation, pointed out that much of the patriotism which is taught to-day is a perverted patriotism, made up of exaggerated national pride, extravagant national self-consciousness, the feeling of national self-assertion and rivalry, and, as such, is opposed to true Christianity. This perverted patriotism was not only relied upon by the autocracies and militarists of Europe, but it was upheld in the United States and taught to children in the schools. Yet the philosopher, Kant, had taught that the peace movement and democracy go together, and lead inevitably to a family of nations where the various peoples would recognise themselves as co-operative brothers, and not as hostile enemies. Human history is utterly meaningless and inexplicable unless we are led through its mazes by the conviction that beneath all its struggle and rivalries there is working out a definite and divine purpose—the federation of the peoples of the earth.

RACE FEELING AND SOCIAL UNITY.

Prof. Boaz brought the weight of a trained scientific mind to bear on the question of the race issue, and gave a most instructive address in the course of which he showed that race antipathy is really of modern development, and belongs essentially to Northern Europe. As most of its inhabitants belong to a certain type (while Southern Europeans are made up of a mixture of many races or types) an opportunity is offered for substituting the idea of race for the idea of social unity, and this for a thousand years has been the ruling conception among so-called Teutonic, Anglo-Saxon, Scandinavian, and other North-Western European peoples. The latter claim to be the highest development of mankind. But this is fallacious. The supposedly Teutonic type really is made up of a great many different peoples, speaking different languages. Our claim to be a superior race, and to have inherited from the ancient Aryans a superior language and qualities,—the very notion that there once was such a superior Aryan race, are fallacies based merely on our sentiment in favour of peoples who look like ourselves. All this talk of a contest between the Slavonic, French, or Teuton races is fictitious. The peoples of Finland, North-Western Russia, Holland, Belgium, Northern France, and Eastern England are all of the same type by descent. The peoples of Central France, Bavaria and Central Germany, Switzerland, Bohemia, Northern Italy, a large part of Hungary, Austria, and some parts of Russia, are all of the same type, as scientific research easily establishes. Therefore, any antipathy between them because of race is mistaken, is absurd. The antipathies that exist between them are the offspring of national solidarity combined with the old-time feeling that all who stand outside of the particular unit must be hostile to it.

DR. ELIOT ON RELIGIOUS CO-OPERATION.

On the spiritual plane Dr. Eliot had taken much the same attitude at one of the earlier meetings when he spoke on the 'Possibilities and Methods of a Closer Co-operation between Religious Liberals'—that is to say, he showed that sectarian divisions were arbitrary and mistaken, that they tended to almost criminal waste and duplication of religious efforts; and that one of the chief means of breaking them down was by the spoken word and the printed page, also the conference and fellowship among large-minded and kindly men and women. "We dedicate ourselves to the cause of freedom in religion," he said, "because we have proved that freedom is the way to serviceableness and real fraternity—the way, but not the end. Freedom is not the final attainment; it is simply the open door. The old perpendicular lines dividing into sects and denominations are becoming obliterated. It is easier now to pass from the fellowship of one church into another. The new lines of stratification, horizontal lines, are becoming evident. To say a man is Presbyterian or Lutheran or a Friend does not define him accurately. Is he of the forward or backward looking element in his constituency? Is it not true that the forward-looking men of all fellowships find themselves now in closer affiliation with each other than with the reactionary elements in their own denominations? Spiritual affinity is a closer bond than any denominational tradition. It ought to be a joy and satisfaction to us that through a small minority we can do all in our power to lead the onward march of liberal people in all communions."

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Bolton.—A Sale of Work was held at Halliwell Road Free Church on Friday and Saturday, April 16 and 17, for the purpose of raising money to meet current expenses. On the first day the Sale was opened by the Rev. J. Cyril Flower of Bank Street Chapel, and Mrs. A. T. Crook presided. On the second day the Sale was opened by Mr. T. Taylor, M.P., Mr. D. Campbell occupying the chair. The sum of £114 was realised.

Chatham.—On Monday evening (19th inst.) the Rev. Dr. Hitchcock, lecturing on the "Hegelian Categories" at the Unitarian Church, Hamond Hill, pointed out that Hegel, a hundred years ago, formulated absolutist and socialist principles. That work needed supplementing by a pluralist and humanist movement. William James had now set this on its way. His pragmatism was one-sided and hostile to Hegel. That was its grave defect. But philosophers and theologians must seek a higher point of view, which would include both Hegel's and that of James. The present war, like the Napoleonic, would mark the birth of a greater philosophy and theology.

Comber, Co. Down.—The Annual Meeting of the Comber Non-Subscribing Congregation was held on the evening of the 13th inst. There was a large attendance. After tea the chair was taken by the minister. The Congregational Reports and Statements, which were both of a most satisfactory character, were read and adopted. Thanks were given to the Sunday School teachers, and to the organist and choir. Then, on the motion of Mr. J. M. Andrews, and seconded by Mr. H. D. Todd, the following resolution was carried by acclamation:—"That we desire very sincerely to thank our esteemed Minister, Rev. Thomas Dunkerley, B.A., for his valuable work amongst us during the past year." In reply, Mr. Dunkerley said that this was the thirty-fifth occasion on which he had received their resolution of thanks, and intimated that he must soon lay down his charge. "In these recent months," he said, "I have received reminders that my physical powers are waning, and that I may not continue to be as useful as you must desire your minister to be, nor as useful as my own conscience demands of me. These monitions, then, and this misgiving, warn me that it is advisable to effect a separation lest delay should check the congregation's prosperity. And after more than forty years' in clerical harness, with all its exactions on mind and spirit, I feel that I have earned the right to retire from active duty without incurring the charge of unfaithfulness. The time has come to make way for a younger and stronger man, for an abler and a better minister. I fervently hope and trust that you will speedily find such a minister to lead you in ways of righteousness." Mr. Dunkerley left the chair at this point, Mr. J. M. Andrews taking his place. The new chairman then read the following message from the Right Hon. Thomas Andrews, D.L., the Treasurer of the Congregation. "I am sorry that I do not feel quite able to attend the Annual Meeting of the Congregation to-night, more especially as I am aware that business of exceptional importance will be discussed. I have looked over our accounts, and I am glad to say that they are, at least, as satisfactory as in recent years. I regret extremely to hear that our most worthy minister, Mr. Dunkerley, intends to take the opportunity of resigning his position as our clergyman... He has been a friend to all, and other churches invariably found him a broad-minded, generous gentleman who was always ready to hold out a helping hand independent of creed or party, and who worked in perfect harmony with those who differed from him in public matters." At this point Mr. Dunkerley retired from the meeting while a most friendly conference of the church members took place. When he was asked to return the chairman read to him the following resolution, which had been proposed by Mr. Alexander Orr, seconded by Mr. Montgomery, and unanimously passed:—"That we, the members of the Unitarian Congregation, having heard with deepest regret of the decision of the Rev. Thomas Dunkerley, B.A., to retire from the active duties of minister of our Congregation, desire to place on record our appreciation of his valued and faithful services for upwards of thirty-five years. During this period the friendly relations which have ever existed between him and ourselves, have ripened and deepened into feelings of admiration and affection. It is our wish that he may accept the position of Honorary Senior Minister, and we sincerely hope that he and Mrs. Dunkerley may enjoy many years of health and happiness in their new home. We further instruct our Committee to take all such steps as they may deem necessary with a view to the appointment of an assistant and successor." We understand that during Mr. Dunkerley's absence the meeting also decided unanimously to recognise his long and faithful ministry, and their affection for him, in some further and more substantial form.

London: Hackney.—The Annual Meeting of the Congregation to hear the Report of the Sunday School and Institutions, and the Friendly Society, was held on Tuesday last. The chair was taken by the Rev. Bertram Lister, supported by the Rev. J. Arthur Pearson, Messrs. C. W. Cornish, Ronald P. Jones, and others. There was a large attendance. The Committee's Report showed that much work was being done on Sundays and week-evenings, Aspland Hall being in use every night in the week. The School, with 240 children, is now quite full. The School Secretary, in proposing a vote of thanks to the Rev. Bertram Lister, spoke of the help the School received from him in all its work, and of the various new institutions that had been started by him, and were being successfully carried on: The Girls' Own Brigade, the Band of Hope, the Kindergarten, &c. The congregation was to be congratulated on the realisation of one of their greatest wishes with regard to the Church, viz., that the School and Church might be brought into close connection with one another. This, by his preaching and teaching, Mr. Lister had done, and parents of the School children were now on the list of subscribers to the Church, eight of the Girls' Own Brigade were in the choir, and the services were regularly attended by the elder boys and girls. Mr. Ronald Jones, in seconding the adoption of the Report, congratulated the meeting on the use it was making of the hall, and on the healthy state of the School and connected institutions. The Rev. J. Arthur Pearson congratulated the congregation on their minister, and in proposing a vote of thanks to the teachers emphasised the necessity and the opportunity of their showing the worth of their religion by their lives. The Rev. Bertram Lister gave a short account of the Friendly Society, which was founded in the ministry of the Rev. Robert Aspland, and had completed its seventy-fifth year. During the evening presentations were made to Miss C. Reader and Mr. H. Keates who, owing to ill-health, had been compelled to resign their positions as teachers, having completed, respectively, sixteen and twenty years' connection with the School.

London: Sunday School Society.—The twentieth Annual Musical Festival of the London Sunday School Society (Unitarian) was held at Essex Hall on Saturday, April 17. The children gathered from many schools and sang their test piece "Sister, awake! close not your eyes!" with beauty and precision and all won the praise of Mr. Ralph Norris, the adjudicator, for the excellence of tone and expression. Each choir sang a second piece of its own choosing—pieces which showed good taste and judgment on the part of the conductors. The Junior Choirs were as follows: Mansford Street (Conductor, Miss E. Harris); Newington Green (Conductor, Miss Ruth D. Young); Stepney (Conductor, Mrs. R. Whitmore Cox); Bell Street (Conductor, Miss E. Harris); Islington (Conductor, Miss Alice Longhurst). The shield was awarded to Bell Street, while Newington Green was awarded second place. Stepney was last year's winner. The Senior Choirs rendered the test piece, Gounod's "Send Out Thy Light," with power and effect, and after a severe struggle the banner was awarded to Newington Green (Conductor, Mrs. R. H. Smith), second place to Highgate (Miss A. Withall); the other choirs competing were Islington (Miss E. Harris) and Dingley Place (Miss Withall). Highgate won the banner last year, and also held the certificate for sight singing. Three choirs entered for the sight singing test, and the certificate was awarded to Dingley Place, Newington Green and Highgate being the other competitors. In the evening the President, the Rev. A. H. Biggs, presided over a large meeting, when an excellent concert was given by the combined choirs, conducted by Miss Jessie Hardy, and representatives of various schools. The choirs sang the Russian National Anthem ("God the All-terrible"), "Lend a Hand," and two part songs, and Mansford Street, Ilford, Wandsworth, Newington Green, Bell Street, Highgate, Islington, and Dingley Place contributed items. The entire Festival was a great success, and although the audience was large and appreciative, it seems a pity that many London schools are unaware of the charm and beauty of this phase of London child-life, and of the wonderful influence that music of this description has over the lives of these young town-dwellers.

London: Wood Green.—A cordial welcome was given on April 14 to the Rev. G. Coverdale Sharpe, the new minister of Unity Church, and Mrs. Sharpe, by the members of the Church and other friends at a meeting presided over by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie. Letters expressing regret at their inability to attend from the Rev. Joseph Wilson (Glossop), formerly minister at Wood Green, Dr. Tudor Jones, the Rev. Delta Evans, and many others were read by Mr. Sudbery, the Secretary of the church. Mr. Bowie reminded the audience that Mr. Sharpe had helped the cause of Unitarianism in Johannesburg and Vancouver. His journeyings in South Africa must have given him a great fund of experience and sympathy, and he hoped that now he had settled in Wood Green it would be the beginning of a long and happy ministry for both pastor and church. The Rev. W. G. Tarrant extended a welcome on behalf of the London ministers, the British and Foreign Unitarian Society, and the London District Unitarian Society. The Rev. Basil Martin of Finchley, Mr. Sudbery (on behalf of the church), and Mr. Box for the choir, Social Club, and other institutions, also spoke in cordial terms. Mr. Sharpe, in the course of his reply, referred to the great influence of the late Dr. Mummery who, in his long ministry at that church, had drawn a band of kindred spirits around him. It was a difficult task to follow such a man; but he looked forward to it. Often when tramping through a thick forest or the desolate veldt of South Africa he had found tracks of men, stronger and more courageous, who had gone before him, and he had thanked them for making the way more clear.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

A PRACTICAL BIT OF PEACE-MAKING.

In a sermon on 'The Golden Rule between Nations and Races,' by the Rev. Jenkin Lloyd Jones of Chicago, published in Unity, the following interesting passage occurs which throws a little light on the way in which a great man in a responsible position can help, if he chooses, to remove the causes which lead to strife:—"In the days of the most severe strain between the United States and Great Britain, when England's sympathies were overwhelmingly with the South, when even Gladstone, as he afterwards confessed, was "brutally on the wrong side," Seward, as Secretary of State, drew up a letter which President Lincoln revised. And here are some of Lincoln's revisions. Where Seward used the word "wrongful" Lincoln used the milder word, "hurtful." Where Seward said "No one of these proceedings will be borne by the United States," Lincoln's revision states, "No one of these proceedings will pass unquestioned." Seward wrote, "When this act of intervention is distinctly performed, we from that hour shall cease to be friends, and become once more, as we have twice before been forced to be, enemies of Great Britain." Lincoln scratched that sentence out entirely. It never went. Again, where Seward used the word "crime," Lincoln used the word "error." And there was no war between England and the United States. It is the opinion of wise statesmen that had the original document as drawn by Seward been transmitted to England in that explosive and powdery time, we would have had another enemy to fight. The United States triumphed by the diplomacy of patience, triumphed by the statesmanship that recognised the frailty of man."

A DISCREDITED NOSTRUM.

Dr. Saleeby on the subject of temperance is always interesting and instructive. Writing in The Daily Chronicle he reminds us that his master in eugenics, Sir Francis Galton, points out in his writings how doctors have successively, through the decades, ordered and abandoned one alcoholic liquor after another as a panacea. Whisky is the last to go. Its exposure is recent. "When the great Russian, Metchnikoff, working then, as now, for the defence of Paris, and all cities everywhere, found that the white cells of the blood protect us against microbes, he next studied the effect of familiar drugs upon this process, and found that alcohol spoils it by intoxicating the white cells. The drunken garrison of the 'City of Mansoul,' as Bunyan called it, fails in the crisis of the assault, and the patient is often lost accordingly. When I was a resident physician in the Royal Infirmary of Edinburgh, in 1902, we always gave whisky, as routine and essential treatment, to every patient who came in with pneumonia. In the following year, having tested Metchnikoff's discoveries clinically, Dr. John Hay reported in Liverpool, that when 150 cases of pneumonia were compared, in two groups which differed only in that some received alcohol as usual and the others did not, the difference in favour of those whose white cells were unpoisoned was 16 per cent. Those results have been since confirmed by wide experience and never controverted. Thus I now know that I killed many pneumonia patients by ordering them whisky in 1902; and I can only plead that I have tried to atone since I retired from practice."

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.

THERE is no sign of any slackening of generous help for our Belgian Hospital Fund. The accounts of what has actually been accomplished which have appeared recently have, if anything, widened and deepened the interest. Many of the special needs, to which reference was made, have been supplied. The Franciscan Sisters have received their consignment of beds, and they have sent us a delightful letter of thanks, overflowing with gratitude and tender religious feeling. It is however, too private and personal for publication. On this side we have heard of fresh efforts to help the work by collections, concerts, and organised effort of various kinds, all of which is most welcome and gratifying.

AND all this help will be needed, and still more. We hear that the recent severe fighting has filled the hospitals once again to overflowing. Fortunately, on our recent visit we were able to leave many of them well stocked for this emergency; but pressure of work means the constant ebbing away of supplies, and we must simply redouble our efforts. Then we have heard this week of the organisation of a group of Belgian military hospitals further south. Already some of the doctors have written to us about their urgent requirements. They tell us that in some of these new places the conditions are very similar to those which existed elsewhere before our Fund came to the rescue. We mean to tackle this new problem at the earliest possible moment. There is, accordingly, every reason why our friends should rally round us with ever stronger support. If need be the simple luxuries of our own lives must be dropped one by one; but the plain demands of duty cannot be denied. Many of these Belgian army doctors have learned to look to us for help, in simple confidence in our friendship. We are not the people to disappoint their hopes.

* * *

It is impossible, even now, to say exactly what has happened at the Western front during the past ten days. The battle has raged from side to side. One day the Germans press vigorously forward, and the next they are thrown back with heavy loss. Here a few yards of trenches are taken by the enemy, there a village is won back a few hours after its capture. It is only when the operations can be viewed as a whole that we shall be able to speak with any confidence of victory for one side or the other. For spectators at home it is an object lesson in the need of patience and steadiness of mind. We must not expect, like some of our armchair strategists, to have a connected account from day to day, or grumble because the news that reaches us is fragmentary and conceals more than it tells. The alternate moods of panic and elation, into which some of the newspapers would plunge us, only exhaust the nervous strength which we ought to put to better use.

"To what purpose is this waste?" This is the question which must be asked by many people as they scan the terrible casualty lists and detect the names of men honoured in their own circle and beginning to be faintly known to fame. It is not material wealth but the lives of these young men, who had they lived would have been the statesmen, the poets, the artists, the explorers of the new generation, which must be the measure of the country's sacrifice. When William Gladstone was killed a few weeks ago we all saw this in a sudden flash. He was the bearer of a great name, and already he had shown himself not unworthy of it in the dignity of his short public life and the high purposefulness of his aims. Fewer people will grieve for Rupert Brooke, who died last week, another victim of the war, on a French hospital ship at Lemnos; but those who realise that a great nation must also be led by its poets will lament the loss of rare gifts of vision and speech. He had already shaken himself free from the mannerism of his immature moods, and gave promise in the sonnets written since the beginning of the war of creative work, of being something more than "the idle singer of an empty day."

A FRIEND, who withholds his name has paid the following tribute to his memory in the columns of The Times :—

During the last few months of his life, months of preparation in gallant comradeship and open air, the poet-soldier told with all the simple force of genius the sorrow of youth about to die, and the sure triumphant consolations of a sincere and valiant spirit. He expected to die; he was willing to die for the dear England whose beauty and majesty he knew; and he advanced towards the brink in perfect serenity, with absolute conviction of the rightness of his country's cause and a heart devoid of hate for fellow-men. The thoughts to which he gave expression in the very few incomparable war sonnets which he has left behind will be shared by many thousands of young men moving resolutely and blithely forward into this, the hardest, the cruellest, and the least-rewarded of all the wars that men have fought. They are a whole history and revelation of Rupert Brooke himself. Joyous, fearless, versatile, deeply instructed, with classic symmetry of mind and body, ruled by high undoubting purpose, he was all that one would wish England's noblest sons to be in days when no sacrifice but the most precious is acceptable, and the most precious is that which is most freely proffered.

MR. CHURCHILL has been subjected to a good deal of criticism for the refusal of the Admiralty to treat German submarine prisoners in the same way as ordinary prisoners of war. Much of this criticism is rather belated and has been prompted by the strong feeling aroused by the harsh measures taken by Germany against English officers as an act of reprisal. It is open to question whether the policy is wise and worth while, in spite of Mr. Churchill's able defence of it in the House of Commons on Tuesday. He pleaded that we cannot recognise persons who are systematically employed in the sinking of merchant ships and fishing boats, often without warning, and regardless of the loss of life entailed, as on the same footing as honourable soldiers. The argument is a strong one, and undoubtedly we should feel its force in the case of an officer who was taken prisoner while engaged in killing wounded men. But it is difficult to discriminate fairly while the war is being prosecuted with great bitterness against ourselves by Germany and the honourable traditions of warfare are being broken by her continually. Submarine prisoners are not alas! the only people who are unworthy to be treated as honourable soldiers. It should be remembered, however, that the treatment meted out to these men by the Admiralty is in no sense inhuman and has not been determined in any way by malevolence or petty spite. We may doubt its wisdom, but there is nothing about it to offend our conscience or to make us ashamed.

A NATIONAL APPEAL has been issued this week on behalf of the dire necessities of the seven million Belgians, who have dared to stay in their native land. They have been kept alive only by the merciful and effective interposition of a neutral Commission for Relief, formed under the auspices of the American and Spanish diplomatic representatives in Brussels and London. Arrangements have been made for the importation into Belgium, in the face of unparalleled difficulties, of food supplies valued at over £10,000,000. But more assistance is urgently needed and Mr. Hoover, the Chairman of the Commission, writes that unless it is forthcoming hundreds of thousands of people will actually starve. "With the rapid exhaustion of the meat and vegetable supplies there will probably be, before harvest time, 2,500,000 in Belgium who must be fed and clothed solely by charity."

* * *

THE Appeal makes it clear that there is no leakage of the food supplies to meet the needs of the German army. On this point the American minister in Brussels wrote as follows at the end of March:—"I am glad to be able to say that there is not a single instance in which a pound of food sent under our guarantee has been touched by the German authorities." But at the same time, all the neutral authorities on the spot are convinced that if the supplies of food are discontinued the Germans will act up to their declaration that they will not, or cannot, save the seven million people from starving to death. Food cannot be exported from this country to Belgium, but the donations so urgently needed to buy it should be sent to the hon. treasurer, Mr. A. Shirley Benn, M.P., Trafalgar Buildings, Trafalgar Square, London, W.C. The working expenses of the National Committee have all been generously provided for, and every penny or every pound received by the treasurer will, without any deduction whatever, reach the long-suffering Belgians in the form of food."

WE doubt whether there is any wavering of confidence among the masses of people in Germany in their ultimate triumph, or any diminution of their fierce and unbalanced hatred of England. They still expect to bestride the world like a colossus and to humiliate every country which opposes their will. But there are some welcome signs that they are beginning to recognise that the rest of the world is not so weak and despicable as they once supposed. The following passage, taken from Der Tag, a newspaper which was jubilant with jingoistic fervours a short time ago, reveals a tendency in some quarters to recover political sanity:

So many of our calculations have deceived us. We expected that British India would rise when the first shot was fired in Europe, but in reality thousands of Indians came to fight with the British against us. We anticipated that the whole British Empire would be torn to pieces, but the Colonies appear to be closer than ever united with the Mother Country. We expected a triumphant rebellion in South Africa, yet it turned out nothing but a failure. We expected trouble in Ireland, but, instead, she sent her best soldiers against us. We anticipated that the party of "peace at any price" would be dominant in England, but it had melted away in the ardour to fight against Germany. We reckoned that England was degenerate and incapable of placing any weight in the scale, yet she seems to be our principal enemy.

The same has been the case with France and Russia. We thought that France was depraved and divided and we find that they are formidable opponents. We believed that the Russian people were far too discontented to fight for their government, and we made our plans on the supposition of a rapid collapse of Russia, but, instead, she mobilised her millions quickly and well, and her people are full of enthusiasm and their power is crushing. Those who led us into all those mistakes and miscalculations have laid upon themselves a heavy responsibility.

THERE are people who seem to expect a spiritual revival to come almost automatically as a result of the war. There are others who talk about the war itself as the defeat of religion, and warn us that these great and terrifying experiences, through which we are passing, will probably leave us with less faith and hope than we had before. Of the two the mood of despondency seems to us the more dangerous. Religion does not thrive on calm and prosperous days, but through strong wrestling of spirit and the love which accepts agony that it may help and save. There is, however, another view, midway between optimism and despair, which is probably the true one for all of us to adopt. It has received fine expression in a letter by Mr. E. A. Burroughs in The Times, written from the Y.M.C.A. quarters at Rouen.

May I add a line [he says] to remind all those who are feeling and thinking about the spiritual issues of the war, how largely those issues are being determined out here? It is not so much that the average British soldier as one meets him in camp, is superficially more religious than he was at home; nor that he is any more likely to troop submissively to church or chapel on his return; if those words still mean to him then what they have too largely meant in the past. It is rather that in him the latent, but universal, human interest in God has at last been thoroughly awakened in a way that this has not yet happened at home. If only it can be met, fostered, and satisfied in the right way, and in good time, he may be the saving of the rest of us when he comes home. But we are still a long, long way from that ideal. The obstacles seem almost to balance the opportunities. And all the time there is the thought in the background, "If the war should end soon, would the new faith that is in him survive the return into the old atmosphere?" It is a fresh reason for throwing open all our windows at home, to clear the air before he comes back.

THE TREATMENT OF OUR PRISONERS IN GERMANY.

THE debates which took place in both Houses of Parliament on Tuesday on the subject of the treatment of English prisoners in Germany will leave a very painful impression on the public mind. They put the seal of official sanction upon reports of calculated brutality, which were so bad that most people must have hoped that they were untrue. Scepticism is, we fear, the wise man's part no longer. Lord Kitchener, with the soldier's instinct to admire the good qualities of his enemy, admits that Germany has stooped to acts of barbarous savagery. "I do not think," he said, "there can be a soldier of any nationality, even amongst the Germans themselves, who is not heartily ashamed of the slur which has been thus brought upon the profession of arms." The Prime Minister, who is a master of precise and accurate statement, said that there can be no shadow of doubt about it, that from the beginning British prisoners have been treated by the Germans in a discriminatory manner. "It is a horrible story," he added, "from whatever point of view you look at it. It is one of the blackest spots on the record even of German methods of war." It is odious to be at war at all; but it is even more odious not to be able to respect the enemy with whom we fight.

On the facts themselves and the moral reprobation which they must excite among honourable and humane men everywhere, it is not accordingly necessary for us to dwell. Nor do we intend to waste our time in any further study of the psychology of German character, as though intellectual analysis might possibly cool our indignation. There are some things for which it is base even to try to find an excuse. Wickedness is wickedness, even when it is perpetrated by an enemy to whom we wish to be strictly fair in judgment. We run no small risk of betraying all the higher interests of men and putting morality itself in jeopardy, if we refuse from habits of gentleness or sentimental leniency to brand conduct of this kind with the marks of public shame and our own loathing and contempt. But this is not enough. We cannot cure an evil situation by strong words, though we may be quite right to use them. Practical remedies must be the first consideration. We want to secure better treatment for our men in the future, so far as we can do it without any weakening of national self-respect. Parliament spoke clearly on this subject, and the debates, which were marked all through by a striking unanimity of feeling and a fine spirit of self-control, helped to make clear the lines of policy which may possibly lead to good results, and those which a Christian nation must instantly reject.

Unfortunately we can only speak of possible remedies; for Germany has it in her power to do exactly what she likes in her own territory at the present stage of the war. She has, moreover, given us only too good reason to suppose that she will persist in her present policy of differential treatment for English prisoners, so long as she thinks that it is to her own advantage to do so. It is for this reason that the policy of reprisals finds a few advocates among us; but fortunately they are very few. In Parliament it was only mentioned in order to be rejected, not only because that is a game which Germany can play with greater rigour than her opponents, but even more decisively because it is inconsistent with everything which we value most in national character and political ideals. Lord Lansdowne, for instance, spoke as follows: "To my mind no policy could be more unfortunate or disastrous than a policy of reprisals in a case of this kind. It is, to begin with, a policy which I go so far as to say a Christian country could not deliberately adopt. I do not believe public opinion would support any government which adopted a policy of reprisals in the full sense of the word." In similar terms the Archbishop of Canterbury deprecated strongly any suggestion of retaliation, and said that he felt that we should be doing a wrong thing and making a very great blunder at the same time if we allowed it to stand on the records about this war that we had attempted anything of the kind. We should stand right with ourselves with posterity and with history if we adhered to the noble, high-minded conduct of war, avoiding in every possible way action which could be regarded as contravening the ordinary rules of international procedure. These two utterances are typical of the tone of the whole debate in both Houses of Parliament. We believe that they also represent the general feeling of the country in its definite repudiation of everything which might be a cause of shame to us hereafter. Few things indeed have been so remarkable since the outbreak of the war as the moral seriousness, the absence of base passion and braggart words in our national feeling. In face of strong provocation and bitter wrong inflicted on our own people there has been no cry for vengeance or lust of hate. It is a proud record which must remain unsullied to the end.

Since we cannot retaliate and a dignified remonstrance would be thrown away upon deaf ears, we can only look for improvement at the moment in the direction where Germany still shows some anxiety to stand well with the world. Here the good offices of the United States have been of real value to us, and handsome acknowledgment was made in Parliament of the help of the American ambassadors in London and Berlin in calling the attention of the German authorities to abuses and pleading for more humane treatment. There has been a good deal in the attitude of President Wilson which we have been inclined to criticise. More than once the punctilios of neutrality have brought him in his public actions to the verge of moral indifference. It is with all the greater pleasure that we pay our tribute to the value of a neutral power, which works unweariedly to lighten the burdens of the war and provides the only effective means by which the conscience of civilised men can make itself heard in Berlin. Germany, we are convinced, will fail all along the line in her attempt to stab us into cries of weak exasperation; but America has made it much easier for us to preserve our dignity and calm under the severest provocation by the knowledge that she is helping to remove the worst causes of complaint.

In his short and stern speech on the subject Mr. Asquith indicated another remedy for this intolerable wrong, though it cannot take effect till accounts are settled at the end of the war. "We shall not forget," he said with deliberate emphasis, "and we ought not to forget, this horrible record of calculated cruelty and crime, and we shall hold it to be our duty to exact such reparation against those who are proved to have been the guilty agents and actors in the matter as it may be possible for us to do." These words are not a vindictive threat that when the time serves we mean to have our pound of flesh. They are a plain statement that just judgment shall prevail, and that the penalty for its infringement is as certain as it is bitter. They are the ancient claim, spoken once again by the lips of a strong man in the name of a whole people, that the wrong doer shall restore fourfold for the wickedness that he has committed and the violator of human right be put to an open shame.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

MENTAL PRAYER.

ACCUSTOM yourself gradually to let your mental prayer spread over all your daily external occupations. Speak, act, work quietly, as though you were praying, as indeed you ought to be. Do everything without excitement, simply in the spirit of grace. So soon as you perceive natural activity gliding in, recall yourself quietly into the Presence of God. Harken to what the leadings of grace prompt, and say and do nothing but what God's Holy Spirit teaches. You will find yourself infinitely more quiet, your words will be fewer and more effectual, and while doing less what you do will be more profitable. It is not a question of a hopeless mental activity, but a question of acquiring a quietude and peace in which you readily advise with your Beloved as to all you have to do.

FÉNELON.

HE [the Christian] will pray in every place, but not openly to be seen of men. He prays in every situation, in his walks for recreation, in his intercourse with others, in silence, in reading, in all rational pursuits. And although he is only thinking of God in the little chamber of the soul, and calling upon his Father with silent aspirations, God is near him and with him while he is yet speaking.

CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA.

IF I should die, think only of this for me :
That there's some corner of a foreign field

That is for ever England. There shall be

In that rich earth a richer dust concealed ;

A dust whom England bore, shaped, made aware,

Gave, once, her flowers to love, her ways
to roam,

A body of England's breathing English air,

Wash'd by the rivers, blest by suns of home.

And think this heart, all evil shed away,

A pulse in the eternal mind, no less,

Gives back somewhere the thoughts by England given :

Her sights and sounds ; dreams happy as her day ;

And laughter, learnt of friends ; and gentleness,

In hearts at peace, under an English heaven.

RUPERT BROOKE.

[Rupert Brooke died on board a French hospital ship at Lemnos on April 23. He was a Fellow of King's College, Cambridge, and was serving, at the time, as a sub-lieutenant in the Royal Naval Division.]

O GOD, our heavenly Father, we come to thee to ask thy blessing. Fill us with love for thy love and trust in thy care. May we go forth to meet thy call, earnestly desiring to serve thee in any way thou chooseth, and submitting ourselves not grudgingly and of necessity, but with joyful self-surrender to thy will. We know that the way of thine appointing is the best. Whether we walk in it in sorrow and weakness, or with joy and strength, may we at all times feel thy presence with us. May every day be begun and ended in thee. Remembering whose disciples we are, may we give ourselves with quiet hearts to our daily tasks, in the spirit of willing service and unselfish love, and be drawn ever more closely into the communion of thy children on earth and in heaven. Amen.

CROMWELL'S CHOICE OF MEN.

SOME years back I read through the whole of Carlyle's 'Cromwell's Letters and Speeches,' and jotted down whatever evidence I found there of Cromwell's careful choice of men for the country's service. I have just turned up my notes, and find them of great suggestiveness for the present time. His Ironsides were raised, not by the frequently low methods of the modern recruiting sergeant, without any inquiry as to antecedents of character, but had been tested and sifted through and through by the sternest ethical and religious demands. "I raised such men," he said to his second Parliament, "as had the fear of God before them, as made some conscience of what they did ; and from that day forward I must say to you, they were never beaten, and wherever they were engaged against the enemy they beat continually. And truly this is a matter of praise to God, and it hath instruction in it—to own men who are religious and godly." "We have not allowed ourselves," he wrote in another place, "the choice of one person in whom we had not this hope, that there was in him faith in Jesus Christ, and love to all his people and saints." We live in great times to-day, but they are not so great as these. Our own days lack the breath of that religious inspiration which made these Ironsides irresistible. We don't go to war to-day to the trumpeting and blast of the Psalms.

I am not inclined to depreciate our own days. I thank God every day that I live in them. And we have been amazed to discover what store of heroism can still be drawn upon by this English people. We have a good cause ; no nation ever had a better. And that gives courage and strength. We love our country with a love no less than that of those of the olden times. But our trust in God is less. That strike on the Clyde the other day is a serious symptom—masters and men jeopardising their country for a few coppers a week ! I can't conceive that it could possibly have happened in those old heroic days of Cromwell and his Ironsides when men "so little valued their pay in comparison of higher concerns to a Public Good that rather than want the Settlement of the Kingdom's peace, and their own and their fellow-subjects' liberty—they would lose all." And that was the temper of the men after five years of Civil War, as an Army Manifesto, dated 1647, bears witness.

"A poor and contemptible company of men," Cromwell styles them in a speech to the Little Parliament in 1653—"neither versed in military affairs, nor having much natural propensity to them," and he attributed their successes simply to their owning a principle of godliness and religion. They trusted God, and kept their powder dry.

"If I were to choose any servant," he says again, "the meanest officer for the Army or the Commonwealth, I would choose a Godly man that hath principles, especially where a trust is to be committed. Because I know where to have a man that hath principles."

Scattered about the letters and the speeches, over and over again you find sentences like the following: "Pray raise honest Godly men, and I will have them of my regiment." "If you choose Godly honest men to be captains of horse, honest men will follow them; and they will be careful to mount such." And not only was he concerned about choosing good men; he was equally concerned about clearing out bad men, no matter how high their station; complains much of my Lord Willoughby as a backward general, and sends him packing at short notice; ousts the Essexes and Manchesters, too, before long, incapables not having been created for leading men to destruction!

"The choice this Protector made of men, in nothing was his good understanding better discovered," wrote Bishop Burnet. "In the whole history of modern Europe," writes Frederic Harrison, "Cromwell is the one ruler into whose presence no vicious man could ever come, whose service no vicious man might enter." "He has a special care," writes Richard Baxter, "to get religious men into his troop; these men were of greater understanding than common soldiers, and making not money, but that which they took for the public felicity to be their end, they were the more engaged to be valiant; so far as I could learn, they never once ran away before the enemy." The same selection of fit persons for offices of trust Cromwell afterwards exercised in the larger area of the State. We read in the historian Neal that if there was a man in England who excelled in any faculty or science, the Protector would find him out, and reward him according to his merit. And Dr. Cudworth of Cambridge was instructed to mark among the youth of that University such as he deemed apt for public employment, and to make the Protector aware of them.

WOMEN AND THE WAR.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—The confusion of voices of the talkers who assume canonical rank, lay down terms of peace or clamour for their proclamation, condone unparalleled crimes in the name of the Christian duty of forgiveness, place the belligerents on the same moral platform, or shout in terms that appear to show them capable of loving all men but their fellow-countrymen, is unfortunately becoming louder; and just at the very moment when we ought to be concentrating our attention on the crisis before us. I was one of a large audience of women who listened the other day to an impressive appeal to women for deeds, not words, made by a prominent Liverpool medical woman recently returned from service in the base hospitals in France. The Government, said Dr. Mary Davies, had appealed to the women, definitely and officially, for help; a new thing in the history of the world. Never before has any Government made a specific appeal for assistance to its women collectively. Women must realise that all they had already done must be immeasurably exceeded, and that quickly. No woman is too old, too young, too rich, too poor, for war service; the nation needs every woman in it. She had recently, she said, come across an optimistic idea that the war was nearly over. What she learnt in France convinced her that the war had hardly begun. To win the victory—if indeed we do win—we shall have to wade literally through seas of blood. The extraordinary preparations now being made for the wounded should bring that fact home to our consciousness. A high military authority had declared that in May we might expect to have to deal with 10,000 casualties a week. For these heroes who are laying down their lives for us no sacrifice is too great, and no effort too hard. Women must do more; they must give more. Hitherto they have given up their luxuries and superfluities; now they must give of their necessities. The women in France are surpassing the women in Britain, said Dr. Davies, for they have seen war, they know far more vividly than we what it means, how it is beyond all description horrible, how it is making the greatest demand on them that ever has been, or ever can be made. They know that it is a struggle to the death; they know what defeat would mean, and what even victory means. We have not yet realised either of these things. The women of Britain must emulate the women of France. The Government alone cannot cope with the necessities of the near future, and they are appealing to the women for every ounce of their energy and power to help them. "The Bishop of London," said Dr. Davies, "declared that the men who had offered themselves in our magnificent way of raising troops were not only brave heroes but potential saints. I have seen many, not merely potential but actual saints, purified by blood and sacrifice. I was announced as intending to speak of my experiences at the Front. I cannot do that. They are too sacred to make copy of. Those things are stamped upon my memory with blood. The day will come to us when the great question of interest to us and our children will be: 'What did we do in 1915?' We cannot all register for the sterner kinds of war service, but every woman owes herself to help in some way with all her power in the great and terrible need that is coming upon us. To over-state that need is impossible."

In the face of this, academic and arm-chair talk seems futile indeed. The women, at least, may be able to realise that no sacrifice is too great to be made for the men who have thought no sacrifice too great to be made for us.

Many have already died; of their sacrificial death our work must be a continuous commemoration. Each of us can add a small stone to that great monument. We must be makers, now, of other things than words.

To those who testify their manhood by urging that unspeakable wrongs must be minimised by indiscriminating sympathy for our "enemies" (forgetting, as M. Clemenceau has recently pointed out, that when the Master to whom they appeal had to do with people "possessed of devils" he resorted neither to argument, nor protest, nor entreaty, nor pity, but "cast out" the devils, even with violence) women can answer without fear of controversy what men's minds through the ages have ratified as divine humanitarianism: "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends." Thousands of plain men have acted on that in these days, not counting the cost, without expenditure of argument or recourse to ratiocination; and we are left with a debt never to be repaid. But we can honour them in those who are taking their places, undeterred by their sacrifice; so that those who have fallen shall not have died in vain.

Yours, etc.,

FLORENCE ROBERTS.

INTERNATIONAL ETHICS AND TERMS OF PEACE.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—You cannot be surprised if some of your readers do not agree with your present attitude on the question of the war. For years you have done your best to convert them into members of a peace-at-any-price party, and you can scarcely expect them to forget the lessons they have learned so readily.

I greatly sympathise, therefore, with your erstwhile followers who find their "sacerdotes" so far fallen from his high estate, but I heartily wish they would not begin to give us their views on the peace question. Our body suffers quite enough from the eccentricities of its professors in various directions without our being misunderstood through the utterances of a limited number who in no way represent it. For the same reason I deprecate the British and Foreign Unitarian Association taking the war as the subject of their Whitsuntide Public Meeting. The speeches then delivered, or part of them, will be published, and the Unitarians as a body will be saddled with opinions that only really find a home in the breasts of a few well-meaning individuals. It is not fair to a generally level-headed and sensible community that their extremists should always be allowed to call the tune. I do not envy those who have followed the course of the war as waged by Germany, and who can plead for anything but the absolute crushing of that nation as a European power.—I am, &c.

THE STORY OF DANTE.

VI.—THE END OF THE JOURNEY.

As Dante climbs the Mount of Purgatory his heart aches and tears come to his eyes at the sufferings of the penitent spirits. Before the climb is finished he has to take his own share of the pain and punishment.

When they reach the topmost terrace they find it all flames save a narrow outer margin. Here Virgil and Dante walk in single file, fearing on one side the fire and on the other to fall downwards. At last an angel stops them, they can go no further without passing through the flames.

Dante falters and cannot be persuaded to proceed until Virgil reminds him that only by going through the fire can he reach the goal of his journey. "Now look, my son, twist Beatrice and thee is this wall." Guided by singing on the far side and encouraged by Virgil, still speaking of Beatrice, Dante overcomes his fear, bears the pain, and wins through—and the angel points to the steps beyond—with his blessing.

The sun is sinking, and before they have climbed the stairway Dante's shadow disappears. They can climb only by the light of the sun, so now they settle to rest for the night—their third night on the mountain—whilst above the rocky stairs the stars shine out, brighter and bigger than their wont. At sunrise they enter the Earthly Paradise where they hope to meet Beatrice, and Virgil's guidance is needed no more. "I do crown and mitre thee over thyself" are his last words to Dante. All is beautiful in the Earthly Paradise. A clear stream flows between forest shade and sunny meadows where flowers bloom, sweet breezes blow, and birds are singing. Whilst he walks up the stream along one bank facing the sun, there approaches him on the other bank, amidst growing brightness and sweet melody, a wonderful procession, and in a chariot, attended by dancing maidens, is Beatrice herself.

Once more in her presence he feels a strange awe and humility. "Queenlike in bearing, yet stern," she gazed at him from beneath her veil and spoke his name with severe words of rebuke. He stood with downcast eyes, overcome with shame. "So doth the mother seem stern to her (disobedient) child," as she seemed now to Dante with her reproaches. In the New Life of his youth he had vowed faithfulness. She had trusted him and he had failed. She had shown him the true path of life and he had not followed her guidance. She had appeared to him in dream and otherwise and still he had wandered astray.

Penitence is not enough. He must confess his fault and failure. So overcome is he with shame that his answer is lost in a burst of tears and sighs. "As children, dumb with shame, stand listening with eyes to earth, self-confessing and repentant," so stood Dante now before Beatrice. So much did the "nettle of repentance" sting him, so much did "remorse gnaw" at his heart, that he fell senseless to the ground. He comes to himself in the stream, into which he has been plunged to purify him from stain. The pure water which had mirrored his shamed face and downcast eyes now washes away even the memory of disobedience to her guidance and to his own sense of right. He is "as one born again" and Beatrice is ready once more to trust him, to help, lead and teach him. During the last part of the journey she is his companion and guide. She takes him, as with wings, up through the heavens past the moon, the sun, the planets and the stars, up to the Heavenly Paradise of his dreams.

On the way there come to meet him at different points in their flight various spirits—saints and teachers, and Dante learns more and more from them and from Beatrice as they ascend.

There are hymns of praise, melodies and harmonies in song and dance, and everywhere peace and joy.

At last, in the heaven of light and love "where abide the spirits of the blessed," Dante sees the rose of Paradise—a wondrous group of saints and angels—and is granted a vision of "the Love that moves the sun and all the stars."

[Since the first paper of this set was printed I have heard the suggestion, for the first time, that the picture of Dante and Beatrice by the bridge represents not the meeting of the salutation, but the later one of the salutation denied. On referring to the artist, Mr. Henry Holiday, I hear that it is the salutation denied. So we know that the sequel of the picture was distress and shame. But that is not the end. Dante's "Comedy" moves to its happy conclusion, from darkness to light, from shame and punishment to joy.

THE NORTH END MISSION, LIVERPOOL. ANNUAL MEETING.

(From our Liverpool Correspondent.)

ONE of the most interesting, as decidedly one of the most satisfying of the demonstrations we call "Annual Meetings," is that of the Liverpool North End Domestic Mission. Annual Meetings are, doubtless, a necessity, and they are also a habit which does not inevitably make for edification. The ear practised in these occasions is dulled with familiar idiosyncracies, and the exigencies of speech-making; it rejoices when it detects among the customariness some strong notes of reality, inspiration and spiritual distinction. This happens at the North-End stocktaking for the year. There arrives a sense of stimulation, a sense of a certain spirit and temper, usually hidden in a modest inconspicuousness; and recurrent though it is it yet gives us a feeling of discovery, and a certainty that hope, love, enthusiasm, are actual and living things. Here we once more become aware of the best being really done, and done in the best way, and with the highest aims and objects; of a difficult service modestly and lovingly performed day by day through the years without thought of applause or reward, and only annually claiming some slight recognition from a community which, if it takes a pride in any of its actualities, might well be proud of this. As a matter of fact, the share of personal attention it attracts from the people whose money supports it is, speaking generally, very small. "There is no finer work among us," said the minister of the Ancient Chapel in announcing the meeting on the preceding Sunday, "nor work more finely done." This statement of spiritual discernment may stand here. It is true that Mr. Haigh persisted rather whimsically in referring to himself as the "instrument" of his supporters, placed there to carry out their desires and designs; proclaiming them as the initiators and himself and his wife as mere accessories in those rhythms of purpose and achievement which beat silently and unnoticed on all the other days of the year in the drab purlieus of the North-End. The unconscious humour of this imputation got home to some of his hearers, however willing we may usually be to hear our masterly inactivities described as genius, and we were glad when one of the speakers thought well to disclaim it. It is certain that the Mission has not become what it is through intermittent and tepid interest at the circumference, but through a passionate concern for the highest things, a concern never flagging nor inattentive at its centre. The atmosphere, with its horizons and its sky, its breezy humanity and faith in the good, its belief in and love of men, is the Missioner's own.

So much is apparent year by year. We always feel after this meeting that there is nothing so great as goodness. But this time there was an exceptional thing making itself felt. Not only did we realise because Mr. Haigh himself so vividly realises the greatness of human destiny in the smallest and humblest of environments; we knew that before our very eyes it had actually slipped beyond significance into splendour. An exultant note sounded through the words of the speakers. Sitting there in ease and safety we were shown how Mr. Haigh's "lads" had rushed forward into a glory of self-sacrifice impossible to us. The call had gone straight home in that busy hive of fresh youth and joy of living, and straightway we saw "the old life shrivel like a scroll." Out of the ordinary stuff gathered there for him to work in and on, the Missioner sees the sudden birth of the hero, who

To unheralded disms

Submits his body and his soul.

"These young lads, our scholars and friends, our representatives, have gone where we cannot go," says Mr. Haigh, "in the spirit of self-sacrifice. Vicarious suffering is a stern and holy truth, as it has ever been. Who can stand and watch these lads pass through the city streets, as I have stood and watched and called to some, without feeling the tears rush into his eyes? They go to meet the pain, the agony, in our stead. A letter from the trenches becomes a holy epistle. . . . The days of the commonplace have passed; the earthen vessel is filled with precious wine. . . . When we meet a soldier now we do not see the same figure as we saw in the days before the great call came. The change has touched our teaching, our preaching, and our prayers." He had had news just before the meeting of one of his lads who had fallen in the trenches—Charles Batson, their choir-master. And the meaning of that death and of so many deaths, the pity of it, and the fineness, and the uncalculating self-surrender, gave us a touch of grace to understand the things that were writing themselves in an epic from which we were excluded. Truly, a unique occasion! The half-patronising interest in the less fortunate whom, by proxy, we were trying to save was "sudden with a light" showing us no longer as the saviours but the saved. We gave a little; they gave all.

The President of the Mission, Mr. C. Sydney Jones, happily returned from voyaging in perilous seas, was in the chair. He has this year had the church at Hamilton Road completely repainted, and in many ways manifested his appreciative consciousness of the work done there. In very sympathetic terms he moved a resolution of regret for the heavy loss suffered in the death of Mr. Alfred Booth and of Mr. Philip H. Holt. Mr. Booth was secretary of the Mission from 1860 to 1864; treasurer from 1875 to 1904, and a subscriber for fifty-four years. Mr. Holt had given his friendship and support for forty-two years. The Rev. J. C. Odgers seconded the motion, which was carried standing and in silence.

The Treasurer of the Mission, Capt. Mark P. Rathbone, is on active service.

The President, in moving the adoption of the Report, spoke of the quite exceptional character of the work of Mr. and Mrs. Haigh. He referred to Mr. Haigh's long service, and expressed his thankfulness that his love of the place and the work had made him proof against all temptations to go elsewhere. The resolution was seconded by Mr. Hugh Rathbone. In both these utterances the feeling of pride in the fine response given by the Mission to the great need of the time was very apparent. It was a response which had overleaped all the boundaries and frontiers hitherto limiting life into an experience and a heroism that were actually saving civilisation.

In Mr. Haigh's Report he declares that the year has also been an exceptional one in that he has received much support in the pulpit. Never before in its history had the Mission seen such a large number of visiting ministers. The average attendance at the services is very good, the church being sometimes crowded, as on the occasion of the visit of the Rev. W. H. Drummond of London. The average Sunday School attendance is well over 400. Mr. Haigh's Senior Class of young men and women, which nearly touched 100 in number, has been greatly diminished by the war; "but the young women have been attending better than ever, partly through sympathy with me in my loss, I believe," says Mr. Haigh; "and so the average has not been reduced to the extent I anticipated." His illumination of the subject of the war to these young people must have been highly valuable.

A St. John's Ambulance Class has been formed, and is being trained both scientifically and medically; and the Boys' Own Brigade is a very flourishing activity. The Mission gave £15 to the Prince of Wales's Relief Fund, which was the sum of laborious savings towards a new piano. "We can wait for our piano until the war is over."

BRITISH WOMEN'S TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE Annual meetings of the National British Women's Temperance Association are being held this year at a time when the question of temperance is very prominently before the public, and although much disappointment is expressed that the high hopes raised a few weeks ago as a result of the speech by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the fine example set by the King are not likely to be fully realised, those who have been fighting the drink evil for many years are taking full advantage of the present opportunity, and pressing the claims of temperance on the country with new energy and courage. At the meeting in Kingsway Hall on Tuesday night the note of personal sacrifice and patriotism was struck by all the speakers, and the response was immediate and emphatic. Lady Cecilia Roberts, who occupied the chair in the unavoidable absence of Mrs. Alys Russell, reminded the audience that they had met at a very solemn moment for their cause. Those who had previously been indifferent to the subject were at last aroused to its importance, and were realising that the temptation of the public house was a menace to the efficiency and well-being of our soldiers and their wives, and to the safety of our country. She believed that if prohibition were enforced now the great proportion of the thinking people of the land would approve of the step. Mazzini said "always make a demand upon the people and they will always respond, but it must be a great demand." Those who could not give their lives in the trenches must give their lives at home, each in his own way, but with a sense of personal dedication. They must never despise the influence they could exercise over one single life, or lose heart because their work did not succeed all at once. Would they have dreamt a year ago that Russia would have risen to such an act of national self-sacrifice as she had done, or that they would wake up one morning to find that their own King had become their colleague?

The Bishop of Willesden proposed the following resolution: "That this meeting representing 165,000 members of the N.B.W.T.A. respectfully urges His Majesty's Government to prohibit the sale of intoxicants in all licensed premises and registered clubs throughout the country during the continuance of the war and for a period of at least three months afterwards, and this, not only for the general welfare of the nation, but because at this crisis such a measure is urgently demanded for the adequate defence of our country and for the sake of the health and morality of our troops." Speaking of the contrast between Mr. Lloyd George's grave statement of a few weeks ago, which had stirred the breath of enthusiasm in all their hearts, and that made subsequently by Mr. Asquith, he asked whether the advocates of temperance were going to sit down and rest contented with the prospect that immature whisky would be abolished and beer made lighter? Such a proposal was beneath contempt, especially in view of the drastic measures which had been passed in France and Russia. It was a fact that here in England they were behind other countries in the world where the deep meaning of their crusade had been clearly seen, and it was difficult to understand the state of feeling in the House of Commons which permitted drink still to be sold there although the highest representative of the people in the land had barred it from his own household till the end of the war. In America, where for years the state of Maine was alone in its adoption of prohibition laws, to-day out of 48 states 19 have prohibition, and probably before long the number will be 25. Early in the present year the representatives of the people of Kansas passed, in their senate, as an answer to the libellous attacks which had been made upon the prohibition movement, a resolution without a single dissentient voice, declaring that the whole state had benefited and been purified and changed in every way by the abolition of drink, and that there were places in which there was not one single penitentiary or a single pauper. So convinced were they of the good effects of prohibition that they would not allow a committee meeting to be held to discuss it. It was for us to take heart and go forward with renewed strength to lift up a standard for the people, whom we could best help by a consistent following of our own principles.

The resolution was seconded by Miss Agnes E. Slack, and carried unanimously.

Mr. Ramsay Macdonald, M.P., spoke with much earnestness on the general subject of temperance, and the responsibility which rested with the people in England to wage an unceasing war against the enemy within. There was no foe more deadly, no foe that sapped the foundations of England's greatness more surely than drink, and if they could only publish day by day and week by week the casualty lists of this war, they would be just as appalling and heart-breaking as those other casualty lists which were pursued with such sorrow at the present time. They were all thinking of the great sacrifices which our young men were making for their country on the battlefield, and it would be a disgrace to those who remained at home if they did not give some moral or spiritual equivalent in order to cleanse and uplift the land they had left and the homes to which some of them would return after the war. What were they that they should walk about the streets in happy security without fulfilling the obligations placed upon them by the crisis through which they were passing? The House of Commons had, in his opinion, failed signally in fulfilling those obligations. It was the duty of those who represented the people to set the people an example, and they had no right to interfere with the liberties of others if they were not willing to deny themselves also. Those who seek to redeem men must show by their own personal conduct that they are worthy of undertaking this great task. They had a great country, and they must try to idealise her, to set her free from the servitude and slavery which had ruined so many happy lives, and destroyed so many hopes.

The following resolution was proposed by Miss Florence Balgarnie and seconded by Mr. Leif Jones, M.P., and carried unanimously: "That this meeting on behalf of the N.B.W.T.A. protests against all legislative schemes which would involve the nation in the ownership, manufacture, or sale of alcoholic drink." Both the speakers emphasised the fact that the nationalisation of drink would be a retrograde step, and that it would have the effect of making every member of the community a purveyor of intoxicating liquor, which was not exactly what temperance advocates would desire. To follow the example of Russia in making the drink traffic a State concern—a step which had had the most deplorable results in national demoralisation, and from which, after twenty years, Russia had only just recovered by the abolition of the monopoly—would be the worst possible policy, and if it was argued that it would reduce the sale of liquor because private persons would not benefit by it, there was no reason for supposing that some future Chancellor of the Exchequer would not find a means of replenishing his coffers by encouraging the trade, and reducing the taxes which really did tend to its decrease. All our legislation was in the direction of limiting the drink traffic at present, and it must continue to do so, for the drink trade was a parasitic trade, and in proportion as it was depressed other trades, useful and productive, prospered. The line for them to take, if they could not have prohibition, was to get the hours of drinking reduced and the taxes increased, and to continue to exercise that influence which enabled them to manage the public houses better than if they became directly interested in their maintenance through the nationalisation of the trade.

LONDON DISTRICT UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETING.

THE Annual Meeting of the young people connected with the churches and schools was held at Essex Hall on Saturday last. After a social half-hour during which groups from all directions came trooping in, the President of the Society took the chair, and the large gathering joined in a hymn which was led by a choir conducted by Mr. T. F. Wood of the Islington Church. The singing was very good indeed, and the anthem 'The Night is Calm and Cloudless' was given a very fine rendering. Mr. Savage Cooper said the war had made apparent a conflict between the doctrine of "love your enemies" and that of "do unto others as you would be done by." There was a conflict of ideals, a deliberate attempt on the part of Germany to cast aside all that Christianity had stood for, and to put back the clock of European civilisation and morality two thousand years. Tame submission to the domineering spirit of Germany would effect nothing but ill. But if they fought on manfully for their principles, even if they were beaten, their sacrifices would not be in vain, and the conqueror would learn that the only true spirit was that of self-sacrifice and Christian unity. Immediately after him came Mrs. Bernard Allen, who spoke of the work of the Belgian Hospital Fund which she had been able to organise with the help of THE INQUIRER, and of her recent visit to the North of France. It was a telling utterance; and brought her hearers into direct touch with realities grim and stern, conditions wantonly, frightfully imposed by the colossal conceit of a highly-organised nation. The audience listened to and admired the woman who had seen a bit of needed work and had done it simply and magnificently, cordially aided by the sympathy of readers of THE INQUIRER.

Mr. Alan Forbes remarked that the question "How can I serve my country?" had resulted in many going to the front. Those who were non-combatants should stand strongly by their churches and endeavour to spread the message of righteousness, justice and brotherhood. It was their bounden duty to help their churches to become stronger forces for good. If they were Sunday school teachers they should stick to their work, for the time would come when the youngsters would have the welfare of the churches in their hands. It was consistent with their religion to hope for a peace that never would be broken; but hope alone would not do; they must work. Miss Durning-Lawrence declared that all present were interested in some form of work: it was of the utmost importance that they should be united, that they should increase their numbers and not let the churches suffer because so many of the young men were away in camp. By pertinent references to such women workers as Mary Carpenter and Florence Nightingale she appealed to the young women present to take up definite work for humanity. Mr. Dunt appeared in khaki; he spoke of interesting experiences that had befallen him as a Unitarian in camp, and won his hearers by his free and sincere utterance. The Rev. J. A. Pearson read a postcard: "Dear Sir, re card for the Y.P.M. to be held at Essex Hall: my brother will not be able to act as local secretary this year as he is 'somewhere in France'"—and spoke of the strange conditions which had led thinking young men to seek the attainment of their ideals by ways they had never dreamed. The war must not be allowed simply to secure moral relations to be established between white peoples. It must set up the Golden Rule for all, more particularly seeing that the Allies had brought representatives of all their colonies and dependencies into the firing line. Some persons said the churches had failed. But had they, when they had provided so many clean-minded men ready, for the sake of honour, fair dealing and justice, to risk death, blindness, deafness, and the loss of limb? They would have failed had there been none to repel aggression and worse! The meeting concluded with the singing of Ebenezer Elliott's "When wilt thou save the people?"

THE Third General Meeting of the National Unitarian Lay Preachers' Union will be held at Essex Hall on Whit Monday, May 24th, at 4 o'clock. At 6 P.M., a devotional service will be held, when the Rev. Alfred Hall will preach on "The Mission of the Lay Preacher," and at 7 o'clock a Conference will be opened to discuss the subject of "Co-Operation" (introduced by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie), Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., presiding.

THE Anniversary Meetings of the National Unitarian Temperance Association will be held on Friday, May 28th, at Essex Hall, the Business Meeting at 4.30, and the Public Meeting at 7.15. Mrs. H. Shaen Solly (President) will take the Chair, and the Speakers will be Mr. J. F. L. Brunner, M.P., Mr. H. G. Chancellor, M.P., Mr. J. W. Pratt, M.P., Mr. Hugh Rathbone, the Rev. W. H. Drummond, and the Rev. C. J. Street.

THE Sunday School Association Anniversary Meetings will be held on Tuesday in Whit-week at Essex Hall, beginning with a Conference on "The Sunday School during War-Time—and After," which will be opened by the Rev. J. C. Ballantyne, of Nottingham, the President, Mr. Ion Pritchard, in the Chair. In the afternoon there will be an address by Miss May Pelton, Lecturer at Westhill Training Institute for Sunday School Workers, Birmingham, on "Spirit and Method," followed by the President's address and the Business Meeting.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Astley.—The School Anniversary was held last Sunday, when the preacher was the Rev. H. Fisher Short of Park Lane Chapel. The collections amounted to £24.

Bolton.—On April 21 a cordial welcome was given by the members of the congregation of Bank Street Chapel to the Rev. J. Cyril Flower, who has succeeded the Rev. J. H. Weatherall as minister. Mr. Miles Gerrard, who presided, speaking on behalf of the chapel and school, said that this was only the fifth occasion of its kind since 1823. There was a congregation numbering 500 and a membership of 300 in the Sunday School, and that augured well for their future prospects now that they once more had a minister at the head of affairs. The Rev. J. J. Wright, in extending a welcome on behalf of the District Unitarian Churches, recalled his own long ministry in Bolton, and his friendship with Mr. Flower's father, the Rev. J. Edward Flower, a Congregationalist. The Rev. E. Morgan, representing local Unitarian churches (Halliwell Road and Unity), Mrs. Haslam, Mrs. Cropper the Rev. W. J. Cleal (Baptist) and the Rev. J. E. Flower of London, father of the new minister, also spoke. Mr. Cleal, who extended a welcome from kindred churches in Bolton, said that they were looking forward with great eagerness to the coming day when they would all be gathered together with their manifold diversities in a great new real catholicity of love and feeling, with a unity of aspiration, and a devotion to one central will and high purpose of the Kingdom of God.

He referred to the fine Bank Street traditions, and spoke of his own feeling that every church should bring into a common fund its own special treasures of thought, life, love, and experience. The Rev. J. E. Flower pleaded for greater freedom of thought. The truth, he urged, must be various because they themselves were so various. Their angles were different, and the point of view could not always be the same. The State control of religion was a great hindrance to its growth, and the churches everywhere required full opportunities for the development of the mind in all directions. Referring to the present crisis he added that when they saw their fine young manhood cut down, they knew that those who sacrificed their lives were but stepping as if from one room to another. They were only going to one of the higher schools in God's living discipline, where they would be taught and trained for a great and glorious future. "Do not be afraid," the speaker added, "to think out the new theology which that involves." Mr. Cyril Flower, in his reply, expressed the hope that through the testing time to come, and after the war was over, they would issue into a new and triumphant faith more deeply rooted in eternal things. On the previous Sunday, Mr. Flower preached to large congregations. In the morning he took for his subject the words "Without haste and without rest," and urged his hearers to unite in a strong bond of fellowship, with a spirit of loving self-sacrifice, for the tasks of the future and the building up of an eternal city.

Burnley.—As the result of an address delivered by Mr. Mackie to the Adult Class in connection with Trafalgar Street Sunday School, when one of the recent articles in THE INQUIRER on the work of the Belgian Hospital Fund was read, the collections taken at a concert held on April 25 amounting to £1 13 6d. were forwarded to Mrs. Allen. Further extracts from INQUIRER articles were read during the afternoon, and Mr. Mackie suggests that the interest of Adult Class members in other places might also be awakened in the same way, and small sums collected which it would hardly be worth while to send separately.

Chesterfield.—The Rev. Kenneth H. Bond, minister of the Chesterfield Elder Yard Unitarian Chapel, appeared on Tuesday night in the role of playwright at a Red Cross entertainment in the Market Hall. The plays, however, had the novel feature of being wordless. In the one styled 'The Haunted House,' the "story" concerned the early part of the fourteenth century and Greystone Manor, and very weird and impressive the various scenes proved. In 'A Sculptor's Romance,' also planned by Mr. Bond, the characters were also effectively, if silently, portrayed.

Coseley.—The 253rd Anniversary of the founding of the Coseley Old Meeting House Congregation by the Rev. Joseph Eccleshall, ejected from the living of Sedgley in 1662, was held on April 11, the preachers for the day being the Rev. A. H. Shelley of Cradley, and the Minister, the Rev. W. G. Topping. Collections were made on behalf of the Church funds. An entertainment recently given in Bradley Wesleyan School by the Old Meeting scholars in aid of the local Belgian Refugees Hostel, resulted in the sum of £5 10s. being raised. The Annual Tea and Entertainment in connection with the Women's Pleasant Hour Society took place on the 14th inst. The congregation is represented on the Coseley Patriotic Society, which has been formed for the purpose of backing up Lord Kitchener's appeal to the nation, and to provide a recreation room for the dependents of soldiers and sailors in the district.

London, Essex Church.—After the ordinary service on Sunday night a Special Memorial Service was held for Private George E.

Lickfold, 1st Devonshire Regiment, who was killed in action in Belgium on April 12. He served throughout the Boer War unharmed, joined his old regiment immediately on the outbreak of the war, and has served continuously in the fighting line till the date of his brave and regretted death. He was an old Essex Church Sunday School boy, and a popular member of the Men's Club. Most of his fellow-members of the Club and many members of the Church attended the Memorial Service. The Rev. J. H. Weatherall gave the address. Three other members of the Essex Church Roll of Honour have been wounded, but happily all are recovering. The latest casualty is Lieut. Thurston Darbshire, Bedford Regiment.

Mossley.—The Annual Conversazione was held at Mossley on Saturday, April 24, the Vice-President, Mr. Frank Hepworth, occupying the chair in the absence of the President. The Rev. B. C. Constable brought the greetings of the Manchester District Sunday School Association, and an excellent entertainment was given by members of the congregation and Sunday School.

Parkstone.—On Wednesday, April 21, a Social Gathering was held to welcome Mr. Clement Ryley, who has taken charge of the Congregation at Emerson Hall as Hon. Lay Worker under the direction of the Rev. W. B. Matthews of Poole. Mr. Matthews presided, and the Rev. H. Shaw Solly welcomed Mr. Ryley as Vice-President of the Southern Unitarian Association; Alderman Herbert Carter, J.P., ex-Mayor of Poole, also spoke.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

THE TEST OF THE CHRISTIAN.

In a recent address from the chair delivered by the Rev. F. J. Powicke, at a meeting of the Cheshire Congregational Union at Manchester, an account of which is given in The Christian World Pulpit, a sympathetic allusion was made to the Unitarians, who are still excluded from the Free Church Councils. "We act," said the speaker, "as if we could not admit their plea to be considered Christians, but if what I have maintained about the basis of the Christian claims is right, we are surely wrong. There may be Unitarians who disown the Mastership of Jesus; and as to them I say nothing. All I wish to say is that since Unitarians generally are as loyal in their personal devotion to Christ as we are, they are no less Christian than we are. Refusal to admit this presupposes that the Christian credential lies in something else than loyalty to Christ. . . . A man's present thought of Christ may not square with any established formula. It may exclude him from the churches. But the test which matters—the test which admits him to the Church of the faithful—is unchangeably simple. Is he loyal to the spirit and mind of Christ?"

RELIGION AND LABOUR.

At the meetings which are being held in Browning Hall, Walworth Road, during the International Labour Week, beginning May 1st, the main subject of discussion is the proper relations between religion and the International Labour movement. The list of speakers includes M. Emile Vandervelde, the Belgian Minister and President of the International Socialist Bureau; M. Einar Li, Labour Member of the Norwegian Parliament; M. Jean Longuet, a grandson of Karl Marx, and Socialist Member of the French Chamber of Deputies; Mr. Arthur Henderson, M.P., Chairman of the British Labour Party; M. Henri la Fontaine, Professor of International Law and Belgian Socialist Senator; Mr. George H. Roberts, M.P., Labour Member for Norwich; and Editor Wirz, representing the Swiss Labour Movement.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.

OUR work for Belgian Hospitals gives us the opportunity week by week of beginning our chronicle of events on the note of charity and human helpfulness. It is here, and not in argument on abstract theories, that religious people find the grace and help of God in this vast welter of misery and wrong. We know how eagerly many of our readers turn to every scrap of information which we can give them. They are anxious to send their money where it is most needed, and they value the personal touch, the intimate sense of helping real men and women in the spirit of friendship, which has marked our relations with the Belgian hospitals from the beginning. For many of us this work is like an open door, in a world which grows ever darker with agony, into the heaven of love and goodness.

WELL, this week we have much to communicate. The work is reaching out continually in new directions, and the only limit to our usefulness is the money at our disposal. If we put a moderate estimate upon the value of the clothing and equipment which we have received in addition to subscriptions our Fund stands now at something like £5,000. In a short article which we publish to-day Mrs. Allen gives some particulars of the way in which the money has been spent. The balance in hand will soon be exhausted as we are expecting to receive very heavy lists from France at the end of this week, owing to the recent fighting. It will also be observed that some large sums, which appear in to-day's list, have been given for a special purpose. During the last few days lines of communication have opened up for us to places where our help has not gone before and the need is as urgent as any that we have dealt with in the past. May we ask our readers to talk freely to their friends about it, and to apply to Mrs. Allen for leaflets, giving information about the Fund. We have found people most willing to be interested, and this method is really more effective than a wider and more impersonal appeal through the Press.

* * *

BUT we want to call special attention to what Mrs. Allen says about the heroic work which is being carried on by Miss Fyfe. Her appeal to us to help her to establish a hospital for wounded civilians, the poor peasants and small farmers who have clung to their homesteads to the last, is one which we could not possibly resist. The medical authorities of the Belgian army see the pressing need and have given the scheme their warm approval, but they cannot use military supplies for civilian work and are anxious that we should help. We have guaranteed £50 a month for six months for this purpose and we are sure that the money will be forthcoming.

* * *

THE cases with which Miss Fyfe is dealing are intensely pitiful. The soldier receives his wounds in battle, but these people are the helpless victims of the invader. The other day she had an urgent message to fetch away from the danger zone 30 old people, 60 orphans, and 10 nuns. Here is a letter which Mrs. Allen received from her this week:—

"I have evacuated hundreds during the last few days from Poperinghe and Ypres, wounded and old men and women who were dying in cellars, and I have had all the time to ask the favour of a car, and one chauffeur went on for thirty-six hours without stopping. Please send an ambulance, it is the greatest need out here as every one will tell you, and as I am the only lady with passes who does civilian work they all apply to me. The old car is again broken down, a battle is raging and so I cannot expect Red Cross cars and I have had two telephone messages to come for wounded civilians at Ypres, and here I am stuck."

WHAT we have done is this. We have arranged with friends a short distance away to lend an ambulance for a few days and we have every reason to believe that it is already at work. Next week we are sending out an ambulance and a car, and special arrangements have been made for their prompt transport. The car is paid for, but we still want £100 towards the cost of the ambulance. A second ambulance is needed for this work and must be sent out at the earliest possible moment. Will any ardent motorist give us one for this work of mercy, or help us to purchase it? We estimate the cost at £250.

WE have not said anything hitherto on a subject, which under the unfortunate title of "War Babies," has received some attention recently in the press. We have kept silence advisedly, because we feel that it is a matter which must be approached with calm thoughtfulness and on a basis of adequate knowledge. That the problem is a serious one in some places is probably only too true, and every one will admit that it bristles with difficulties. Pleas for condonation on the one hand and rhetorical talk about "the shame of our girlhood" on the other, seem to us to be equally useless and untimely. Miss Clephan, in the admirable article which we publish to-day, adopts a much wiser method of approach. She gives us information about the work of guardianship and warning which has been carried on since the beginning of the war by 1,600 women patrols in 84 military centres. In this way much of the evil has been foreseen and prevented, and a body of kindly and observant women has been trained, whose help and advice will be of great value in cases where lapses have occurred. At the present moment the only recommendation we have to make is that the women who have organised this admirable piece of work and grown wise in practical experience, should consider the problem in all its aspects, both personal and social, and assume the responsibility of giving us some public advice. No one else has such a good right to do it or would be listened to with equal respect.

* * *

THE accounts of the recent naval actions in the North Sea are, as usual, lighted up by the heroism and humanity of our sailors. It is the combination of courage and chivalry which redeems the terrible business of war, and makes it possible for honourable and high-minded men to take part in it. The picture of English sailors exposing themselves to grave risks in order to rescue drowning Germans gives us as strong a thrill of pleasure as the news of a victory. We hope that the lesson will not be lost upon some thoughtful people in Germany. They must, at least, have a suspicion that this observance of the fine tradition of the sea squares but ill with the lurid caricature of English character, which has been invented in order to justify their policy of hate.

GERMANY seems to be determined to carry through the logic of her military theories to the bitter end without regard to any obligations of honour, or to the burden of moral infamy which she is laying upon her own people. The poisoning of wells, which has been made the subject of a protest by General Botha, has received official sanction in South Africa. On the Western front Sir John French reports that everything points to the fact that long and methodical preparations had been made for the use of poisonous gases on a large scale. He mentions that in the recent attacks the German troops were provided with specially designed respirators which were issued in sealed pattern covers. His own plain words are the only comment that is needed on this vile business:—

Since the enemy's first use of this method of covering his advance with a cloud of poisoned air, he has repeated it both in offence and defence, whenever the wind has been favourable.

The effect of this poison is not merely disabling, or even painlessly fatal, as suggested in the German press. Those of its victims who do not succumb on the field and who can be brought into hospital, suffer acutely, and, in a large proportion of cases, die a painful and lingering death. Those who survive are in little better case, as the injury to their lungs appears to be of a permanent character, and reduces them to a condition which points to their being invalids for life.

These facts must be well known to the German scientists who devised this new weapon, and to the military authorities who have sanctioned its use. I am of opinion that the enemy has definitely decided to use these gases as a normal procedure, and that protests will be useless.

* * *

ONCE again the organised forces of Drink seem likely to come off victorious. The proposals which were introduced by Mr. Lloyd George last week were an obvious compromise. They have aroused no enthusiasm in the country, and the determination of the vested interests that, whatever happens, they are not going to pay, has been their undoing. We wish that the scheme for national purchase could be revived, but we fear that the right moment for an heroic remedy of this kind has gone by. All fiscal arrangements are matters for close criticism and discussion in the House of Commons, but on this occasion care for the profits of a particular trade has eclipsed entirely the larger considerations of national welfare. It is incumbent upon the critics of Mr. Lloyd George's proposals to counter them with some scheme of their own, which will be at least as effective in crippling the deadly power of drink.

THERE is, undoubtedly, a tendency in many quarters, after a short period of alarm, to slip back into the feeble common place that the drink evil has been greatly exaggerated. We are sorry to see some of the Labour members repeating this barren cry. Their amour propre, or that of their constituents, has been offended, and they are adopting the foolish pose that the statements about the effect of drinking habits upon certain departments of industry in the Government White Paper are an insult to the working man. No plea could well be more hollow or insincere. The wage-earners of this country are not all saints, and certain trades are more cursed with drink than others. Their leaders know this quite well. If our colossal drink bill could be halved there would be a vast increase in industrial efficiency, and an incalculable improvement in the health and happiness of working-class homes. Mr. Lloyd George mentioned in his Budget speech that the net increase in the consumption of spirits, after making a liberal allowance for forestalments, was, in December 3 per cent, in January 6 per cent, in February 15 per cent, and in March 25 per cent. This increase in spirits over the estimate represents a consumption of 2,900,000 gallons. Will any man deny that this increase in drinking has taken place to a large extent among the wage-earners, or plead that it has no appreciable effect upon industrial efficiency?

* * *

THE gigantic figures of the Budget, which was introduced on Tuesday, have been received by the country with remarkable sang froid. This is due largely to the absence of fresh taxation. Moreover it requires some special knowledge to follow these large operations of national finance. One thing, however, is quite clear, and ought to be impressed deeply upon our minds. We cannot finance the war simply by borrowing. A large part of the cost must be met by the savings of the community. Even if our earning capacity remains at its present high level, a much larger proportion of our income must go to national instead of personal ends. In this connection there will be some legitimate disappointment that there is no proposal to put a special tax upon war profits. That certain groups of capitalists and wage-earners should grow rich at the present time, while other people have to impoverish themselves or practice severe self-denial, seems to us to be contrary to a sound social policy. There should be an equality of sacrifice in all classes of the community so far as the financial burden is concerned, and this is impossible so long as war profits accumulate on a large scale and are not subject to special taxation.

WORKING FOR VICTORY.

THERE is a growing feeling in some quarters that we are not taking the war and its hard duties with the seriousness and the unselfish courage which a time of supreme national peril demands. Our fighting men have acquitted themselves magnificently, and behind them there has been a disciplined host of civilian workers who have done their part with splendid energy and effectiveness. But large sections of the community still live in a quite normal fashion. They carry on their business as usual. They have not modified their standards of comfort. They still plan things for their own advantage as they have been accustomed to do in times of peace. They have a vague hope that the war will soon be over, and leave the world as pleasant a place for them to live in as it always has been hitherto. People of this kind may not be conspicuous individually; but in the mass they help to mould public opinion, to encourage a lazy type of optimism, or to dissipate in criticism and complaint the energies which ought to be concentrated on the one object of vital concern for us all.

We have just entered upon the tenth month of the war, and the end is still far off. The first excitement has died away, and in its place there is an impatient desire for some striking event which will supply a dramatic thrill for jaded nerves, and assure us that all is well. Probably these are the days which will test us all most severely, for we have reached the dull middle stages of a long task, when we must simply set our teeth and press forward, bating no jot of heart or hope, and giving no foothold to influences which weaken and divide. There is need for all of us to be on our guard against the revival of sectional interests and the type of criticism which is more concerned with complaints about the past than with constructive proposals for the future. Several of our newspapers have erred in this way lately. In their weariness of the political truce they have dabbled freely in disintegrating criticism, and laboured to produce public discontent by the method of dark hints and vague surmise. In the House of Commons we find the Government almost paralysed in its efforts to deal effectively with the problem of drink by the resistance of commercial self-interest, the unworthy resentment of class-feeling on the side of Labour, or the doctrinaire programme of the temperance reformer. Nor does it require much gift for social observation to detect some tendency on the part of people whose routine has hardly been disturbed, just to settle down and look after their own affairs in placid confidence that Germany will be beaten, and all will come right in the end.

But we are at war, we are fighting for our existence; and the battles, which will determine whether we shall retain our liberties or fall a prey to a ruthless destroyer, are not behind us, they have still to be fought and won. There is safety for us and a sure hope of victory, but only if we keep the mood of high seriousness in all our thoughts and ways, and all classes and sections of our people throw their own interests to the winds in devotion to the common good. In this testing hour there is only one thing that concerns us. We have got to win in this war. It does not matter if we are poor, and feel the sting of want—and that may well happen to us—if we come out of it victorious. And for this purpose we must mobilise all the practical gifts of the country, its wealth of thought and moral fervour and its high religious passion, that the good issue for ourselves and the world may not be hindered by our devotion to selfish or partial ends, or spoilt of its full effect by divided counsels and poverty of soul.

We agree with the words of the Prime Minister, spoken this week, that the nation does not need to be goaded by rhetoric before it can be induced to obey the calls of duty. It is not so much flaming words as serious consideration that we need. Do we realise what the calls of duty are? Do any of us shrink from putting them in the plainest possible terms to ourselves and other men? It is sacrifice that is demanded of every one of us, a spirit of fine devotion to the cause we have in hand, and of calm indifference to our private interests. There are two things which can help us to keep this temper of resolution through the difficult middle period of the war. The first is the effort to realise—religious people may do it by an act of quiet meditation—what the war means in the invaded countries. No one who has touched even the fringe of its appalling misery and wrong can put the thought away from him, or allow other interests to compete for his attention. It stands there, dominating his life, and determining all his duty, until the need is past and the avenging victory is won. The other is the sense that everything which has happened has strengthened and confirmed the moral convictions of the early days of the war. Germany put the sword of the spirit into our hands when she invaded Belgium. Her cynical disregard of honourable undertakings, and her revolting barbarism in the conduct of war have rallied the moral forces of the world against her. Something dearer than our own safety and peace is involved in the victory for which we strive. We want to win, and we would give all the high seriousness of purpose of which we are capable to the task, because it will check the proud defiance of evil men. Victory in this cause, let us dare to say it, means to our dim human sight a victory for God.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

THE POWER TO BE QUIET.

AMID the care and strife of our common life how much we need the power to be quiet. It is pitiful to be at the mercy of things which are but the incidents of a brief and passing day. To be strong and brave we must have root in ourselves. To get out of life a Divine education we must have the calm and well-balanced mind which in prosperity keeps us humble, and in adversity patient. The power to be quiet means power to bear suffering, to compel losses to yield us some moral gain, and out of temporal defeat to wrest an eternal victory.

It is possible even in these exciting and troubled days to cultivate and preserve the power to be quiet—the quietude not of weakness, but of strength, not of passion exhausted, but of passion controlled and used, not of a world renounced but of a world subdued to the service of the soul and the obedience of Christ. Meditation and prayer will help us. Obedience will help us. Great peace have they whose obedience to the highest and best is quick and constant; who instead of getting away from things, seek rather to get right with things. It is the peace of Jesus which the world cannot give nor take away.

JOHN HUNTER.

UNFOLD ! unfold ! Take in his light Who makes thy cares more short than night,
The joys which with his day-star rise
He deals to all but drowsy eyes ;
And (what the men of this world miss),
Some drops and dews of future bliss.
Hark ! how his winds have changed their note !
And with warm whispers call thee out.
The frosts are past, the storms are gone,
And backward life at last comes on.
The lofty groves in express joys Reply unto the turtle's voice ;
And here in dust and dirt, O here
The lilies of His love appear.

HENRY VAUGHAN.

ALMIGHTY God, who givest us our quiet seasons of thought and prayer, help us now and at all times to find in thee our true peace. Save us in the hour of trial, deliver us from evil thoughts and desires, and from the tyranny of outward things. May we learn of Christ to be strong and brave in the struggle with temptation, and to overcome even as he overcame. AMEN.

THE BELGIAN HOSPITAL FUND.

Now that the Belgian Hospital Fund has been in existence nearly four months, contributors will be interested to know how their money has been expended. The following table shows at a glance the expenditure classified under the main heads :—

	£	s.	d.
Hospital equipment (surgical instruments, nursing appliances, drugs, bedsteads, etc.) about	1,150	0	0
Linen and blankets ..	300	0	0
Woven underclothing ..	150	0	0

Boots about	100	0	0
Clothing for convalescents ..	70	0	0
Kitchen equipment for hospitals	80	0	0
Carriage and distribution in France	150	0	0
	£2,000	0	0

The items for woven underclothing and clothing for convalescents were incurred during the first very cold months, and there is practically nothing spent under that head now. Boots also were only sent at first before other agencies, specially concerned with such things, were at work.

The cost of carriage is not great when it is remembered that everything goes out under personal supervision and has to be delivered by motor lorry from the port, considering, too, that we have sent about £4,000 worth of goods, and that strong packing cases and packing material are included under this head. Experience has shown that goods sent alone take weeks to arrive at their destination if they ever do ! A case of valuable goods sent by a friend to us at Calais started six weeks ago, and has not yet arrived. By our method, we have never yet lost a case, and everything has arrived at its destination two or three days after leaving London.

Beside the goods bought with the money sent in we have received and forwarded to the hospitals about 17,000 articles of clothing, household linen, bandages, boxes of games, and many other things, the value of which it is impossible to estimate. They have arrived in parcels varying from one pair of mittens in an envelope, to packing cases containing twelve bedsteads, and they come by post, by carrier, by railway and by hand. The parcels are then unpacked, lists made of their contents, and repacked according to the requirements of the hospitals. Miss Gertrude Martineau and Miss E. Dowell have given three mornings a week to this work since the beginning.

As an instance of the variety of the appeals the following extracts from a letter received on April 30th are interesting :—

"General asked me if we could not do something to help his convalescents at I motored down and have just returned. There are 5,500 Belgians there, 700 of whom are convalescent typhoids. There is also a 30 bed hospital. There are 500—600 tubercular patients, and the doctor, an ardent bacteriologist has got no microscope. He would be most grateful for one. Could you supply him ? It is really a necessity. [A good one was secured at once secondhand and despatched on May 3rd, and he has it by this time.] The men need lots of soup and milk and at present only get ordinary soldiers' rations. We are sending four girls to install a canteen to supply this nourishment. If you saw their little bare huts and wooden benches and pale faces it would make your heart ache. Up to now they arrive at a station twelve kilometres from the camp, and have to walk however ill they may be, but ' nous allons changer tout cela.'"

Is there any thing that we, on this comfortable side of the Channel, can do that would be too much in the face of such need ? The letter goes on "one longs to be a millionaire and able to divide oneself in four at least." Such work as this ought not to be hampered for lack of funds.

Up to the present time the work has been entirely among military hospitals. I have described in a previous article our meeting with Miss Fyfe, a lady engaged in refugee work at the front who wanted help with her maternity hospital. The events of the last week have resulted in a great many civilians, men, women and children, being wounded. At present this Miss Fyfe has nowhere to put them. The military hospital which opened its doors to them cannot keep them as all its beds are needed. She had the offer of a house for them, where she could have fifty beds, but she had no funds to rely on for their support. She has asked us to give her a guarantee of £50 a month, and the need is so urgent that we have telegraphed that we will undertake it. It was impossible under the circumstances, after what we have seen ourselves out there, to refuse ! We hope the hospital will be open by the time these words are in the hands of our readers. Some time ago some of our friends offered to support nurses. We could not arrange this as the difficulties were too great. Will they transfer their offered gifts to the maintenance of this hospital ?

Through the generosity of two or three friends a motor car and an ambulance have been secured for work among civilians, but £100 more is wanted on this separate account. These two cars will go out soon and the need for them is very great, specially at this moment. The car is for carrying expectant mothers to the maternity home, and the ambulance for the wounded civilians in the towns and villages on the front.

To sum up—we have spent on an average since we started over £100 a week on medical necessities, etc., and we have sent out about 1,000 garments a week as well. We have made many friends, and there are many fine men and women out there who look on us as friends and rely on our help. We cannot give personal service at the front, but it is our part to strengthen the hands of those who can.

ROSE ALLEN.

THE WORK OF THE WOMEN PATROLS.

THE world to-day is so given over to noise—the noise of rumour, of prejudice, and recrimination, as well as the trumpet cry of glory and heroism, that it is very difficult to keep a clear sense of the proportion of things. The earthquake and the tempest are in full force, and the still small voice is yet to come. One of the most recent of the agitations, which has been fanned into flame by the somewhat irresponsible utterances of the "popular" press, is connected with the "revelations" concerning a phase of camp life. Sentimentalists, without considering the necessity for careful investigation, and accurate information, are acclaiming the value of an increased birthrate, from whatever source it may be drawn; are depreciating the interference of the social worker, and adjuring the State to step in and adopt for its own the children born of the camp, for whom the rights of family life and a father's protection will probably not be forthcoming. It may be of interest just at this moment—without discussing the rights or wrongs of an unusual situation—to call attention to one quiet agency which was the outcome of a perception of the dangers which might have to be faced, and which set to work quietly and thoughtfully to prevent mischief rather than to remedy it after its occurrence.

As early as September in last year, when the new, untried conditions of camp life were just beginning to make themselves felt, reports were brought to the notice of women engaged in social work of the dangers likely to arise owing to the foolish and excitable—perhaps excusably excitable—behaviour of many of the women and girls in the neighbourhood of the camps. It was felt that if action were to be taken at all it should be taken in good time and to such good purpose that prevention should precede, and, if possible, forestall the work of rescue which would otherwise become inevitable later on, and save the young and thoughtless from the consequences of their own inexperience and irresponsibility. The National Union of Women Workers appreciated the gravity of the situation, and acknowledged the responsibility laid on women trained to think, even in the midst of disturbing influences. These women felt themselves to be on trial. If the safety of the nation's honour and freedom were entrusted to the keeping of its men—its fighting men—the moral welfare of the nation, the restraint and sobriety of conduct under excitement and difficulty, must become largely the charge of women, and by their action in the present emergency their claim for a larger sphere of usefulness in the work of the nation in future would naturally be judged. It was felt that if sensible and tactful women, with experience of life, could get into really sympathetic touch with the young and thoughtless their natural excitement might be led into other and healthier channels.

The Union decided to form a special committee—entirely apart from the existing one for preventive and rescue work—to be called the Women's Patrol Committee. The Home Secretary and the Chief Commissioner of Police when approached were in cordial sympathy with the scheme proposed, and gave their sanction for the organisation of bodies of Women Patrols, who were to be accorded the support and assistance of the police in any district in which their services might be required. The Patrols were to be voluntary workers—women, speaking generally, between the ages of twenty-seven and fifty—they were always to do their patrolling in couples, and only to be on active service for two hours at a time. Their business would be to patrol the towns, and the neighbourhood of the camps at the hours when the soldiers were off duty. In order to safeguard the project, and to ensure that none but duly accredited women would be engaged in this special work, the Home Secretary circularised the Chief Constables throughout the country advising them to sign a card for the use of each Patrol in their district—the signed card to read as follows: "The bearer—is authorised by the National Union of Women Workers of Great Britain and Ireland, and the police are desired to render her any necessary assistance." This card was supplemented by an armlet bearing the initials N.U.W.W., and each Patrol in addition to her pass and armlet was to be supplied with a small book of regulations, as a very necessary precaution against any unconscious over-riding of the legal liberty of the subject.

The necessary funds for such a wide scheme of work were quickly forthcoming (sufficient, at least, for a six to eight months' campaign). Organisers were appointed and were fully trained for the work that had to be done. These in their turn have trained bands of Patrols in various districts in the knowledge of their duties, and the powers and limits attached to these, and acquainted them with Police Court Regulations, and the differences between Police Court and Military Law, so that mistakes arising out of ignorance of legal limitations may be successfully avoided.

At the present time nearly sixteen hundred patrols are working in eighty-four different localities, one hundred and eighty-four of whom are in the London area. Everywhere—with one single exception—the work has been warmly welcomed by both military and civil authorities, and commanding officers are pleased to note the consequent improvement in behaviour in the neighbourhood of their camps. In one place a special constable notes "that the young men and girls know that they are being looked after and behave better in consequence," as the mere presence of the Patrols is often enough to create a healthy and restraining influence. The Patrols themselves feel assured that in most instances the girls do not want to behave badly—they just know no better, and they are often ready to try to improve when a better way is put before them, and a more wholesome form of pleasure in their introduction to clubs and recreation rooms. "A Woman Worker like us—and a friend to us girls," was the verdict pronounced by an enthusiastic club girl on the organiser with whom she came in contact. Finally, the War Office now officially recognises the value of this work, and Lord Kitchener himself has given instructions to the military authorities to help the patrols as much as they can. The unsolicited testimony of a Metropolitan drill sergeant is to the effect that the Women Patrols "were doing their work so quietly and with such tact and discretion that the police welcomed them" as "they touched work the police could not. And what's more," he added, "they are making themselves so valuable to us they've come to stay."

The possible solution of this difficult problem may lie in social efforts such as this—and others of a like nature, for these workers are aware that the present difficulty is not so entirely exceptional as at first sight it would seem to be. They know from their experience of city, and even of country, life that the present circumstances have not introduced a new evil, they have only intensified an existing one. The donning of his majesty's uniform does not necessarily turn the untrained, undisciplined city lad, or countryside loafer, into a hero, though it may set him on to the way of becoming one. The equally undisciplined girl, sadly in need of wise home restraint, may use or abuse this exceptional opportunity of "enjoying life" regardless of consequences, but she would equally use any opportunity afforded her in her ordinary daily life and surroundings. And further, many of the allegations seem to have been rather carelessly made, without any attempt at a real investigation as to the facts of the case. Warnings are now beginning to be heard, and so clear and fair a thinker as Mrs. C. D. Rackham urges strongly that the thoughtful public should not accept "general statements as to the number of 'war babies' that are to be expected during the next few months without the most careful investigation," adding that "there is no doubt that many of the 'hundreds here' and 'thousands there' so glibly quoted have melted away when enquiries were pressed home." In one case, it was reported that three hundred of such births were expected in a town—investigation proved that there were only six. The trouble will be greater in some localities than in others—but exaggeration will only tend to confuse the issue. From accounts received it can hardly be denied that in the main the men and youths who have enlisted have done so with intention to uphold the honour of their country, not to betray it. This is patent to any one who cares to study the faces of the young recruits as they swing along the streets with steady step and head erect, looking straight ahead as if at an aspect of life that has never presented itself to them before, and mouth set firm to meet bravely what may come to them, life—or death.

In the case of the lapses from high purpose, which will claim attention to the needs of young mothers and helpless children, it is surely not the office of the State to attend to these—the State with its cut and dried methods applied indiscriminately to all alike, without distinction of type, temperament, or degree of temptation; it should be the work of the women who understand the conditions, and who can use their human influence and sympathy to help to build up in these girls a sense of the meaning of motherhood and awaken their mother-love. Confidence may be placed in such women as "voluntarily give their time to patrol dull and often lonely spots, in all weathers, in order to help these young girls and try to turn their attention and energies to something better than hanging about places where soldiers are congregated.... It is on them, and on their faithful and persistent labours, that the permanence of the good work begun must depend." And, surely, that way hope shines for the future.

ANNIE E. CLEPHAN.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

THE Private View at the Royal Academy seemed rather a strange experience this year. Men in khaki and naval uniforms were in evidence everywhere, and the intimate way in which some of the former criticised the pictures proved that they were formerly more at home in studios than military camps. There is generally a lot of purely "art" talk at the Private View, but except in days like these, when all sorts and conditions of men have joined the colours, you do not expect to hear military men joining in it very freely. The war pictures, too, contributed something quite out of the common to a not uninteresting exhibition, but these, with few exceptions, are the painstaking productions of men who have honestly tried to give the public the dramatic thrill which the press supplies almost hourly, and rather lamentably failed. Perhaps Mr. Lavery has succeeded better than most with his "Armoured Car Squadron"—a very ugly picture, in which much ingenuity has been expended on the limning of very ugly things—for he does, at least, make one realise in some slight degree the outstanding feature of the present conflict; its appalling hideousness, and its utter lack, except in the personal heroism of the men, of the glow and colour which once lent a fatal glamour to the profession of arms. Mr. Wyllie's picture of sinister Dreadnoughts, breathing black smoke ('The Masters of the Sea'), conveys the same idea, and is in startling contrast to the lovely 'Day in October: Venice,' by David Murray, which faces it. The one symbolises sheer destructive power—a force which tears down and annihilates the work of men's hands as ruthlessly as the earthquake or the forest fire; the other portrays the imperishable beauty born of sunny skies and rippling waters, framing a city of dreamlike palaces where the spirit of loveliness will dwell as long as one stone is laid upon another.

While on the subject of war pictures, however, let us give its due meed of praise to Mr. Lavery's more ambitious work, 'Wounded: London Hospital, 1915,'—a picture which, although designed to meet the common need for some outward expression of the prevailing sentiment, does give something more than the material adequate to satisfy that craving in the radiant sunlight dappling the floor of the ward, and the sense of light and air which cheers us even as we look pityingly at the young Highlander whose wound is being dressed by a sympathetic nurse, or the swathed figure with half the face hidden in bandages on the bed in the foreground. Mr. Olivier's picture of the meeting between King George and King Albert at the frontier post on the road, from Dunkirk to Furnes has, of course, great historical interest, though the unkindest comments were made on the lifelessness of the figures by people who wanted to enjoy the picture immensely, and were quite unable to feel its reality. There are pictures of Belgian refugees, too, in which the pathetic groups of peasants are too obviously posed. The figure we like best to remember is that of the little boy with the orange-coloured scarf in Mr. Richard Jack's interesting 'Homeless,' stolidly tramping along with the household cat uncomfortably clasped in his arms. A very curious picture—by Mr. W. L. Wyllie again—represents 'The Fighting Line from Ypres to the Sea,' as seen from an aeroplane. The aeroplane itself, like a huge butterfly with parti-coloured wings, hovers over a vast expanse of misty country in which you can dimly discern the line of the Yser, the British and German fire trenches, the St. Eloi Road, and even "Hill 60," all lit up with bursting shells and the light of burning buildings. The names of the places mentioned, and others as well, are printed round the frame—a novel proceeding which led a man of very decided views, evidently a connoisseur, who was showing some friends round, to declare that the painter had "forgotten he was an artist and thought he was a journalist."

If you can escape from the mental environment created by such pictures as these, it is a great relief to find Sargent again at his wonderful work of flooding some small canvas with the burning sunshine of the Tryol, as in 'Tyrolese Crucifix,' or dappling emerald mosses and ferny woodland depths with light and shade as in 'Master and Pupils.' The fantastic 'Mountain Graveyard' is another picture from Sargent's brush, and he gives us also one or two portraits this year, including 'F. J. H. Jenkinson, Esq., Librarian to the University of Cambridge.' The portrait painters are, as usual, well represented, and some of them have done admirable work. To those who know her the characteristic portrait of Miss Henrietta Busk, by Percy Bigland, is very pleasing—the expression of the eyes and mouth are so happily caught. Mr. George Clausen's allegorical 'Renaissance,' in which the spirit of the new France is seen pointing to the crocuses springing amidst ruins, is so strangely unlike his customary work that it is hard to believe he is responsible for it; in other pictures he adheres to the style he has made peculiarly his own, as do men like Farquharson, Stanhope Forbes, George Wetherbee, Sir W. B. Richmond, Poynter and Arnesby Brown. Miss Lucy Kemp-Welch's 'A Year Ago,' with its wealth of apple-blossom, is very charming, but the pathos of the girlish figure in black would be even more poignant if the two shadow-figures—the girl and her lover in happier times—were not indicated on the other side of the tree. Such devices for instructing the imagination are rather barefaced. Alfred Parsons has a very pleasing little scene, 'Lake Biwa, Japan,'—all misty water, and clumps of rosy-red and flame-coloured azaleas; and Laura Knight's 'Mayblossom,' drenched with the hot sunshine of a delicious day in early summer, is very restful to the eyes. It reminds us that Spring is in the air once more, and that in spite of the devastation of war life is renewing the beauty of the world.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

THE RIVER GRETA IN MAY.

THE latter half of April has been so cold that the sycamore flowers you were warned not to overlook in that month are not yet fully open in Cumberland, whatever they may be further south. One tree, fortunately abundant in these parts, is in full glory of bloom in sheltered situations on the banks of the Greta. The white flowers are so glossy that they shine like alabaster in the sun. The bees see and smell them from afar and will joyfully gather the honey they yield. The old rhyme says that bees "gather honey all the day from every opening flower." This is a pretty and poetical idea, but unfortunately it is not quite true to fact if it means that bees visit each flower they pass in field or garden. What really happens is that the bees in a hive make for the honey-yielding flower that is most abundant at the time, and which gives a good return for their labour. If they begin one fine morning on cherry blossom they will keep to that flower for a long time, and visit no other unless to rest. They may keep to the cherry blossom for hours, or for all day, or even for two or three days. You know that bees gather pollen at the same time that they collect honey, and by the taste and colour of the pollen which you see in the pollen baskets in the joints of their legs you can generally tell what flower they are working on. When they are working on holly flowers their whole bodies will seem to be well dusted with rather dirty flour. The holly blossom is nearly ready for the bees. Some flowers yield brown pollen, some a rich orange. Dandelion pollen is very pretty. Look at the bees you will see crowding on this flower in mid-May if not earlier.

The dippers I told you about, "our dippers," who were still making their nest on April 6th, have prospered. By the 13th, when they had been building for a month, only one dipper was seen at a time, so we guessed that the hen bird spent a good deal of time on the nest, and on the 16th I managed to reach the rather dark place above the mill-race and under the mill buildings in which we knew the nest must be. I could just see the glossy white chin of the sitting bird as I splashed along the conduit in high rubber boots. People who visit dipper's nests often have to walk through water. She sat still till I was within three yards of her, then dashed silently past me. There were four glossy white eggs, so newly laid that they had the rosy flush, like that on the petals of a blush rose, which these eggs always have when first laid. A week later there were still only four eggs. Now we are waiting in the hope of seeing the young birds when first they venture into the open river. We know they are still in the nest, because we see the parents dart up the mill race and under the mill with food. The little dippers will be darker coloured than their parents, and will not have the broad white bibs, but they will be the better able to escape the notice of possible enemies. They will dive like old hands the first moment they reach the water.

For two days early in the week the Keswick children and their teachers were busy gathering wild flowers and making posies and garlands in preparation for the crowning of a May queen, which took place on Wednesday beside the Greta. A queen is chosen in turn each year from the different Bands of Hope of the schools in Keswick and the villages near. The children walk in procession through the town, headed by the queen and her twelve maids of honour. The queen carries a lily sceptre and rides on a white pony which is also decked out with flowers. When "Queen Margaret" was crowned this week, Canon Rawnsley, the vicar of the parish, as one of her "ministers," read her proclamation to us all. May queens are crowned in a good many country places, but I do not know of any where kindness to animals is the subject of a proclamation, so you shall read the one to which I refer.

THE MAY QUEEN'S PROCLAMATION.

"To all her beloved subjects, both boys and girls, the Queen commands that they shall be kind to all animals—that they shall not hunt the wrens, or stone the squirrels, or chase the cats, or rob birds' nests; but shall learn by heart the notes of birds, and know when they come and when they go, and how they sing and what they say; that they shall not kill nor hurt any living creature needlessly nor destroy any beautiful thing, but shall strive to save all gentle life; that they shall not root up ferns, nor break down blossoming trees, but shall learn the names of the flowers and their seasons and habits, and watch the budding of the trees.

"And to all coachmen, drivers, grooms, and ostlers, that they shall look after their horses well, not use bearing reins, nor work them too hard, nor load them too heavily, under pain of our most severe displeasure.

"And to all cow keepers, that they shall give their cows plenty of air and light in their byres, that so they may be kept in health and give good milk.

"And to all sportsmen and game-keepers, that they shall not under any circumstances shoot owls, kestrels, or buzzards, who are their best friends; nor, contrary to the law of the land, set barbarous pole traps or use cruel egg-baits.

"Also it is our will and pleasure that a copy of this our Proclamation be hung up in every house and schoolroom within our ancient and loyal Parish of Crosthwaite."

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION

PRESENTATION OF THE MOTOR AMBULANCE.

A GREAT many of our schools have been taking their share in local work for the sick and wounded who are sent home from the front, and also by forwarding parcels to the soldiers they have in many ways alleviated their hardships. It was, however, felt by the Committee of the Sunday School Association that something national should be done, and they therefore appealed to the teachers and scholars of our Sunday Schools and to the young people of our congregations to give a motor ambulance, which would be presented to the British Red Cross Society and placed at the disposal of the military authorities. The cost of such an ambulance is £400, and it is customary to give at any rate £100 towards the cost of upkeep, which is about £10 a week. The appeal was launched and the result has been satisfactory beyond all expectation. On the day fixed for sending in contributions and on the following day about 130 letters were received, and the fund increased in twenty-four hours from £143 to £501. There still remained, however, the cost of running expenses after the ten weeks which were provided for, and the Committee were very anxious that every school should have an opportunity of giving, so that the gift might be in truth from all the Unitarian and Free Christian Churches. The fund was, therefore, kept open and has now reached the sum of £725, which has been given by 259 schools; about 45 old scholars and teachers and other friends have contributed individually. It would be difficult to find a better object for which those who agree in their faith could combine than the one which has been undertaken, and how much the gift is appreciated by the British Red Cross Society is clear from the very cordial letter of acknowledgment which has been received from their Secretary, in which he says:—"The thanks of many a wounded soldier will go out to you for your precious and welcome gift."

In order that some of the children, at any rate, might see their car, and that it might be presented in a manner worthy of the splendid way in which the fund had been subscribed, it was decided to have a formal presentation. This was held at Essex Hall on Sunday, May 2nd, and took the form of a service conducted by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant. The Hon. Secretary of the Association, Mr. T. M. Chalmers, sent an invitation to the children and young people and to all those who had kindly helped in the arrangements. Most of the London schools sent contingents and several other schools had arranged for representatives. Altogether there were at least 850 children, young people and their friends present. Unfortunately the large hall proved too small, and an overflow meeting had to be arranged in the smaller hall. While our sympathy goes out to those who were too late to find room in the principal meeting, we are sure that they will be the last to regret the excellent attendance which caused their banishment. The Rev. T. P. Spedding and Dr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., very kindly stepped into the breach, and by their genial presence and readiness of speech kept this meeting going, so that the volume of its singing bade fair to rival that of the one upstairs. At the main meeting there was a large muster from the Boys' Own Brigades, Scouts and Girls' Brigades, all in their various uniforms, and the different colours against the gay background of flags with which the walls were covered made it one of the most picturesque meetings that have yet been held in Essex Hall. Those who were responsible for the uniforms can have the satisfaction of knowing that they added to the ceremony that essential element of beauty which is too often absent from our religious observances. Miss Minna Tayler and her assistants are to be congratulated on their decoration of the Hall, and Mr. Tittford with his stewards on the excellence of their arrangements. The Rev. W. G. Tarrant, in his address, spoke of the history of the Order of St. John of Jerusalem and of its work in training for ambulance duty. He also told the children how, out of the little country of Switzerland, there had grown the Red Cross movement which has done so much for the sick and wounded on the battlefield. The children who had given this ambulance had had their part in that movement, and they could rejoice that it was for the purpose of alleviating suffering and to decrease the horrors of the battlefield. Mr. Ion Pritchard, the President of the Sunday School Association, then formally presented the ambulance to the British Red Cross Society from the scholars and young people of our Unitarian and Free Christian Sunday Schools and Churches. He said that those present were there as representatives of all those who had given. He explained how the idea originated, and told of the way in which the officers had waited with some trepidation, but always with hope, for the coming of letters containing the contributions, and of their joy when the schools had risen so magnificently to the occasion. Mr. Frank Hastings, Secretary of the British Red Cross Society, then accepted the ambulance on behalf of his Society. He spoke of the work of the ambulances which he himself had seen, and of how necessary it was to have a large number for the conveyance of the wounded. An ambulance more or less and a few minutes gained might mean the difference of life or death to a wounded soldier. The hospitals at the front had the sky for their roof and the earth for their floor, and they could have only the most elementary equipment; it is, therefore, absolutely necessary to bring the wounded back from these temporary hospitals immediately behind the firing line to those nearer the base. On behalf of the Red Cross Society he thanked all those who had given for their generosity, and assured them of the thanks not only of the Society but of every wounded man who would benefit by their gift.

After the meeting those who were present went down into Essex Street, where the car was waiting, and all were given an opportunity of seeing it. It is the usual four stretcher ambulance, which is so arranged that four men can be carried on stretchers, which are placed two below and two above like the bunks in a ship. If necessary the stretchers can be taken out and the boards folded back so as to form a wagonette seat on each side, and in this way a larger number of patients who are able to sit up can be taken. It bears a plate with an inscription recording the gift by the scholars and young people. Then the Brigades and Scouts lined up and a photograph was taken. Finally, 'God Save the King' was sung, all saluting, and the parade was over. The key-note of the gift itself and of the meeting might be found in the two quotations on the programme, which were as follows:—

"Peace is gone from me suddenly and I can by no means keep me from the fight, for the cause is a right cause and one that must be ransomed, yea, though all else be given and lost for it.... Yet, grieve not, for how shall that which is given be 'lost'?"—Henry Newbolt.

GIRLS' CONVALESCENT HOME.

WE have been asked to call attention to the following appeal:—

You were good enough to publish a letter in which we invited contributions for furnishing and decorating the rooms in the new wing which we have just added to our Barleycrofts Girls' Convalescent Home. We suggested that the approximate cost would be about £10 per room, and friends and donors were invited to suggest the names of some of the good women who have adorned our community after whom the rooms might be called. We have received in response £10 from Miss Limb of Chesterfield, in memory of her mother, £1 from Mr. H. Marsden of Manchester, and other smaller sums. One of the new rooms will be named after Mrs. Limb, and for some of the others the following have been suggested, viz.: "Aunt Amy," Mrs. Gaskell, Florence Nightingale, Dorothea Dix, Mary Carpenter and "Catherine of Liverpool." We shall be glad to receive other suggestions. We think it will be good to fold our guests in the gracious spiritual atmosphere of these abiding memories at the same time that our good matron ministers to their physical needs.

We now beg to make two requests. We want portraits of the ladies named to be hung in the rooms called after them, and, if possible, a copy of the well-known 'Lady with the Lamp' for the Florence Nightingale room. And then we want about £60 to complete the work. It is a difficult time to urge an appeal. We will not compete with or challenge the proper precedence given to appeals arising out of the present situation. If, however, over and above the claims to which we cede precedence any friends can still find a little help for this work of benevolence to the working girls and women of our own community, we shall be most grateful. We are anxious, if possible, to open the new wing for Whit-week: that must, however, depend on circumstances.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Birmingham, Church of the Messiah.—The Rev. Lawrence Clare, minister of Park Street Church, Hull, has accepted an invitation to the pastorate of this church, in succession to the late Rev. J. Worsley Austin, and will commence his ministry at the beginning of October next.

London, Islington.—On Thursday evening the last of a course of twenty-five lectures on 'Social Psychology' was delivered in the Preston Room of Unity Church by the Rev. Dr. Tudor Jones. After the close of the lecture, the Rev. D. Davis stated that the members who had attended the lectures had derived so much profit from them that they felt they must present some token of appreciation to Dr. Jones. Miss Gaine, in the unavoidable absence of Mrs. Bull, said it gave her great pleasure to present to Dr. Jones, on behalf of the members, a testimony of their high appreciation of his lectures, and expressed regret that they were about to lose his invaluable services. Miss Gaine then handed to Dr. Jones a parcel of fifteen volumes of philosophical works. A further present was made to Mrs. Jones. Both Dr. and Mrs. Jones expressed their gratitude and reciprocated the kind wishes of the members.

Manchester, Longsight.—On Sunday, April 25, the Forty-eighth Anniversary of the Church was held, the Rev. Wm. Whitaker of Platt Chapel being the preacher. In the evening he gave an address on the position of the Churches in the present national crisis, and emphasised the necessity of a stricter self-discipline among those of the Free Churches. An Organ Recital was given in the afternoon by Mr. Rufus R. Burgess, A.R.C.O., organist of Bank Street Chapel, Bury.

Newcastle-on-Tyne.—The Anniversary Services of the Church of the Divine Unity were conducted on Sunday April 25th, by the Rev. C. J. Street, who preached to good congregations. His subject in the morning was 'Why Do We Want a Church?' and in the evening, 'What a Church Should Be.' Mr. Street was visiting the scenes of his boyhood; but only a few who were members during his father's ministry in Newcastle now remain. More than half the present members have joined during the ministry of Mr. Hall. On Monday the Anniversary Meeting was well attended, and the spirit throughout was encouraging. The chair was occupied by the Rev. Alfred Hall. In a review of the work of the past year, he said a great deal had been done for which he felt deeply thankful. They could say that the work had gone on in a steady way, and they had, perhaps, done more work than in any previous year of his ministry, for the reason that there had been special efforts of which they were all proud. They had every reason for satisfaction and for rejoicing at the results of their activity. Unitarians, he continued, stood for a spiritual as opposed to a materialistic interpretation of the world, and for the belief that the interpretation of religious experience was not to be found in the past alone, that it was not to be discovered in its fulness in any book handed down, or in any creed received from the past. They said definitely that beliefs of bygone days were not adequate to explain life as they knew it in all its complexities. On the proposal of Mr. James Thomson, seconded by Mr. Carter, a vote of thanks was cordially passed to Mr. Street for his services. In the course of an earnest address Mr. Street showed how the Unitarian faith stood the test in the present crisis. That Church, like his own, had put forth great efforts to help those in distress, and had sent some of its finest young men to serve and to risk their lives for their country. Great sorrows might be ahead for some of them. He thought they ought to apply the individual test. To hear of men falling by thousands was distressing; but when they asked of any young man, for instance, the late Lieut. Gladstone, whether it was worth while, the answer came that though the cost had been death, the sacrifice had revealed the inward life, and had better have been made than withheld. He had been glad to be there, and to find that they were a live Church. Other addresses were delivered by the Revs. W. H. Lambelle, A. Scruton, and Mr. Stephenson.

South East Wales Unitarian Society.—The Annual Meetings were held in the Unitarian Church, Merthyr Tydvil, on Monday, April 26. The Rev. Simon Jones, B.A., presided over the proceedings, and representatives were present from nearly all the affiliated churches. A meeting of the Executive Committee was held in the morning, and in the afternoon the subscribers came together for the Annual General Business Meeting of the Society. The Hon. Secretary, the Rev. W. J. Phillips, presented the Twenty-Fourth Annual Report of the Committee; and Mr. Gower Ll. Thomas, Treasurer, his financial statement. Notwithstanding the financial disturbances which had inevitably taken place owing to the war, the income of the Society had not been adversely affected to any appreciable extent, and the financial year closed with a balance in hand, although the usual activities of the Society had not been in any way curtailed. The Report referred with gratification to the renovation of the chapel at Carmarthen, which it is hoped will shortly be re-opened for Divine Service; and also to the establishing of a new mission movement at Tredegar. The reports from the churches were, on the whole, of a very satisfactory nature, and showed that they had been alive to the duties imposed upon them consequent on the war. They had sent out young men to augment H.M.'s forces, opened their schoolrooms for the use of soldiers and Belgian refugees, formed sewing and knitting circles for providing comforts for soldiers and sailors, and done other good and useful work. The officers and Committees for the ensuing year were elected: the Rev. Simon Jones and Mr. John Lewis being re-elected President and Vice-President respectively. The restarting of the Postal Mission work, which had been held in abeyance during the past year, was discussed, and it was decided that the Society should become responsible for the expenditure involved in Postal Mission work, which was entrusted to the Home Missionary Committee, with Mrs. John Lewis as Acting Hon. Secretary. A representative Committee was also elected for the purpose of endeavouring to make the Sunday School work more effective, the Rev. J. Carrara Davies being appointed its Hon. Secretary. Another important subject which came up for discussion was the better organising of the Lay Preachers' Union, which was entrusted to the Rev. Geo. Neighbour. The President extended a very cordial welcome to the Rev. T. Eric Davies, formerly a Congregational minister, who has recently been appointed minister to the church at Pontypridd, and also to the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, who was present as representative of the B. & F.U.A. Both gentlemen responded, and Mr. Bowie conveyed the fraternal greetings of the B. & F.U.A. to the Society, expressing his pleasure at being present during the proceedings. At the close of the Business Meeting Mr. John Lewis presided over a Conference at which the Rev. Simon Jones read a paper on 'Unitarianism After the War,' a discussion following in which the Revs. W. C. Bowie, Philemon Moore, and D. G. Rees took part. In the evening a Religious Service was held in the church. The Rev. T. Eric Davies conducted the devotional part, and the Rev. F. Blount Mott preached the sermon on 'The Reappearing Christ.' There was a large congregation which quite filled the church, and included friends from the Aberdare, Cefn, Dowlais, and Cwmbach Churches. On the previous day nearly all the ministers of the affiliated churches exchanged pulpits.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

OUR BLIND SOLDIERS.

The case of the soldier who has returned from the war hopelessly blinded is a particularly sad one, for his life is more completely ruined than that of the majority of wounded men, and it will require more fortitude to face the long years of darkness that lie before him than even the hardships of the trenches demanded. That all possibilities of usefulness are not over, however, even when sight has gone, is proved by the activities in which the blind soldiers and sailors at St. Dunstan's, Regent's Park, are now learning to take part. Under the guidance of able instructors, themselves without sight, these men are being taught a number of trades, such as carpentry, boot-making, mat-making, and, of course, basket work. Others are learning to manipulate Braille type-writers, many are being trained in massage; and, owing to the fact that St. Dunstan's stands in fifteen acres of ground, it has been possible to add poultry farming and market gardening to the occupations already mentioned. Capt. Pierson-Webber, one of the best known blind experts in England, has taken over this section. He was himself originally a soldier, and the story of his life, and of his marvellous success in overcoming the disadvantages caused by blindness and competing with agricultural experts on their own ground, should prove inspiring to all who come under his influence. An air of great cheerfulness pervades St. Dunstan's, and Queen Alexandra, who visited it a short time ago, expressed her amazement at the progress the men had made. It is hoped that it will be possible to place them in permanent posts when the period of instruction is over.

A TRIBUTE TO MRS. GHANDI.

The work of Mr. Ghandi on behalf of his fellow-countrymen in Africa is well known to English people, but little has been heard of the help rendered to the cause by his brave wife. Mrs. Ghandi has, indeed, not only loyally supported her husband in all his efforts, and carried on his work when he was far away at great cost to herself, but she has also endured the hardships of prison life, together with the wives of several other passive resisters who shared Mr. Ghandi's ideals. She is a born fighter in the sense that she never gives way before injustice or oppression, though her weapons are patience, courage, silent endurance, and fidelity to principle. In an address full of sympathy and affection delivered in her honour by Mrs. Kadambini Ganguly at the Mary Carpenter Hall, Calcutta, a few weeks ago, the warmest tribute was paid to her womanly loyalty, and to her wisdom in training her son to follow his father's example in the courage and true nobility of self-sacrifice. "India blesses you," the speaker said in conclusion, "from the depth of her heart, and looks forward in her troubles to you as the harbinger of a better day, a newer and nobler era."

A FRIEND OF WILLIAM MORRIS.

Mr. Philip Webb, the architect, who died a short time ago at his cottage in Worth, Sussex, where he settled after retiring from business in 1900, was a great friend of William Morris with whom he co-operated in the work of the firm of Morris & Co., and for whom he designed the Red House at Upton, in Kent. This delightful place was conspicuous, unlike other houses of the period, for its plainness, and the quality of its material; but with its warm red brick walls and tiled roof, its position among the fruit trees which surrounded it (Mr. Mackail tells us that apples fell in at the windows as they stood open on hot August nights), its rose-trellis and its well-house, it made an ideal home for a lover of beauty whose chief mission was to bring back the old love of country life and handicrafts to "merry England." Mr. Webb was, of course, a frequent visitor to the Red House, where groups of friends, including Rossetti, Burne-Jones, Swinburne, Madox Brown, and Arthur Hughes foregathered, playing bowls, romping, and driving about the country in a leather-curtained carriage of Morris's own design. With Morris he founded the Society for the Protection of Ancient Buildings, and also took some part in the Socialist movement during the years when his friend was fighting so boldly for public reforms, and writing 'John Ball' and 'News from Nowhere.'

KIKUYU AND JASPER.

In the course of his 'Western Wanderings,' which are described in The Cornhill Magazine, Sir Arthur Conan Doyle has come upon a raw Canadian town, in the first stages of its experience, where the note of religious strife is, as yet, unknown, although various denominations have their following. This little place will certainly grow into something much bigger, like all these primitive townships in a country that is advancing very rapidly, "but now, bar Col. Rogers's house and the station, there are only log huts and small wooden dwellings. Christianity is apostolic in its simplicity and in its freedom from strife—though one has to go back remarkably early in apostolic times to find those characteristics. Two churches were being built, the pastor in each case acting also as head mason and carpenter. One, the cornerstone of which I had the honour of laying, was to be used alternately by several Nonconformist bodies. To the ceremony came the Anglican parson, grimy from his labours on the opposition building, and prayed for the well-being of his rival. The whole function, with its simplicity and earnestness, carried out by a group of ill-clad men standing bareheaded in a drizzle of rain, seemed to me to have in it the essence of religion. As I ventured to remark to them, Kikuyu and Jasper can give some lessons to London."

BIRDS IN THE WAR ZONE.

To those localities in the war area where no bird will be able to live this summer, or where none can raise a brood, it will be probably many years before the feathered tribes return. According to a Times correspondent, the nightingale, though we are accustomed to think of it as peculiarly a British bird, is to be found in great numbers in France, and the woods of the Marne and Aisne, and all the Belgian coppices, are usually full of nesting nightingales at Whitsuntide. There is a French proverb, believed to be of Belgian origin, which says that in default of thrushes one must even eat blackbirds! This may to some extent explain why song birds were never too numerous in regions which are now laid waste. Nightingales abound in the Carpathians, but among the men who are fighting there must be many, on the Russian side at least, who come from latitudes where Keats's immortal bird is quite unknown.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.

It will be seen at a glance that our Belgian Hospital Fund has made most excellent progress during the past week. The £250 for a motor ambulance for which we appealed last week, has been given to us twice over. First of all Mr. C. Sydney Jones of Liverpool and Mr. Ronald P. Jones of London combined to provide this need, and the next day brought a cheque for £250 from Mr. Hugh R. Rathbone for the same purpose, fortunately with the thoughtful proviso that the money may be used for other necessary purposes connected with our work. We cannot express our thanks too warmly for such bountiful help. We have also had many generous gifts from people who can only give a little money and a great deal of affection. One sum in our list represents a second donation from a group of lady clerks in a London office. It was accompanied by a delightful letter, which, by its warm-hearted sympathy, doubled the value of the gift. But perhaps most interesting of all is the sum of eighteen shillings, made up of farthings contributed by the scholars in one of the poorest infant schools in London. This beautiful gift of the babies will not be forgotten.

On Wednesday afternoon Mrs. Foster Morley lent her studio at Hampstead for a drawing-room meeting in order to interest a fresh group of friends in the work. Mrs. Russell Rea was in the chair and the audience included the Mayoress of Hampstead. Mrs. Allen spoke with delightful simplicity and directness about the Fund, how it came into existence and the amount of help which it has sent already to the Belgian hospitals. A great deal of enthusiasm was aroused, which bore instant fruit in the shape of a handsome collection. The personal character of the work and the close relations of friendship, which we have been able to maintain with the hospitals, evidently made a strong appeal. We desire to express our most cordial thanks to Dr. and Mrs. Morley for their kindness in the matter and to commend the example to others who may be able to help in a similar way and so gradually extend our circle of friends and sympathisers.

It is impossible to avoid some reference to the sinking of the Lusitania, though nothing remains to be said. Alike among the Allies and in neutral countries the crime has aroused the strongest feeling of abhorrence, which is only intensified whether Germany faces the storm with brazen effrontery or sinks to the level of her usual clumsy excuses. We have made much of it, not because it is any more cold-blooded or horrible than many other atrocities, which must be laid to the German account in the war, but because it strikes the imagination of a sea-faring nation, and brings the menace of heartless cruelty nearer to ourselves and our own sheltered homes. Of course it will have no military significance, except to put ocean steamers more upon their guard, to stimulate recruiting, and to add moral force to the arms of the Allies.

DURING the first few days of the week speculation was rife about the probable action of the United States in view of the fact that Germany can claim the credit of murdering nearly one hundred American citizens on board the Lusitania. Evidently American feeling has been deeply stirred, but President Wilson has preserved his attitude of aloofness and silence, except for a very short speech in which he made the enigmatical remark that a nation may be too proud to fight. Military intervention seems unlikely. It could not be of much help to the Allies, and we see on our side as clearly as the most cautious American statesman can do the disadvantage to the cause of humanity if relations of formal friendship with Germany are broken off. Belgium would starve if American help were withdrawn. At the same time there are insults which no country can accept without a loss of self-respect. A Government which never goes beyond fine words in its efforts to protect its citizens from outrage may, by its action, be digging the grave of its own reputation. The latest information is that America will address a smart and dignified remonstrance to Germany, which may lead to the withdrawal of her ambassador from Berlin without any overt act of war.

THERE has been an unfortunate outbreak of anti-German feeling in various parts of the country. Angry mobs have assembled, shops have been wrecked and looted, and many people of German name have been roughly handled. This outbreak of aimless hooliganism is much to be deplored. It is the froth thrown up by our deep feeling of indignation, but it would be foolish to exaggerate its importance or to speak of it as a sign that any large section of the population has gone mad. In many places the crowds have consisted of irresponsible youths and boys and angry women, all spoiling for a row, and a little severe discipline by the police will soon cool their temper. At the same time no wise man will ignore the fresh importance of the alien problem. The policy of rounding up people of German blood, who have lived among us on terms of peaceable friendship for many years, and have always shown themselves loyal to the country of their adoption is repugnant to our best feelings. But if it is necessary in the interest of public order and their own safety we must accept it as one of the minor misfortunes of the war.

* * *

ON Thursday the report of the inquiry made on behalf of the Government into alleged German atrocities in Belgium was issued as a White Paper. Lord Bryce has acted as chairman of the Committee and the other members were Sir Frederick Pollock, Sir Edward Clarke, Sir Kenelm Digby, Sir Alfred Hopkinson and Mr. Harold Cox. It would be impossible to find any men with greater capacity for sifting evidence or more likely to be judicial in mind. What they say must carry conviction, however strongly our feelings may desire to discredit it. It has been rumoured for some time that their verdict would be a very terrible one. Now that it is before us, based not on isolated cases but on the cumulative weight of the testimony of a multitude of independent witnesses, our minds almost refuse to believe it. We need give no details here. Those whose duty it is to read these things can do so in the Report. Here is the conclusion: "Murder, lust, and pillage prevailed over many parts of Belgium on a scale unparalleled in any war between civilised nations during the last three centuries." The duty which these terrible revelations impose upon the conscience of mankind is stated in the following words at the close of the Report:—

Our function is ended when we have stated what the evidence establishes, but we may be permitted to express our belief that these disclosures will not have been made in vain if they touch and rouse the conscience of mankind, and we venture to hope that as soon as the present war is over, the nations of the world in council will consider what means can be devised to prevent the recurrence of such horrors as our generation is now witnessing.

MR. LLOYD GEORGE used some very plain and spirited words about the Drink evil on Wednesday evening. Even his modified proposal to check the use of raw and immature whisky was met by a fire of criticism, because it will affect the prosperity of two or three firms in Belfast. There is a spirit which we can only describe as one of hideous levity in the way in which the Drink Trade is fighting for its own interests at the present time. What does it matter if it loses very heavily during the period of the war? Other businesses have done so already without a murmur. It is the sacrifice which they have to make for the country in its hour of need. But there is still, we fear, a widespread feeling that by some juggling with figures, and by making frantic appeals to the Government for compensation or increased wages, we can come out of this war with our material prosperity unimpaired. No wise and patriotic man ought to cherish such a futile dream, or to spend time in Parliament or anywhere else merely in looking after his own interests. We have got to struggle and to suffer together, be the cost what it may. It is not a time for any class in the community to claim that whatever happens its standard of living must remain what it is. This is the fallacy, both of thought and feeling, which underlies the plea of Mr. Philip Snowden that the wage-earners should be exempted as far as possible from any share of the financial burden.

WE have been trying to say this in our own way for a considerable time, and we have warned our readers that we must all be prepared to live on narrower means, with a drastic reduction in our pleasant luxuries, for many years after the war is over. Let us commend to their notice the following words by the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Everybody [he said], ought to contribute. You could not go into a great war and say the vast majority of the people were not to give up anything. It is not right even to expect it. The working classes were making sacrifices by sending their sons to the war and going themselves. So were the other classes. There was no class of the community which had not done that. So upon that there was an absolute level of sacrifice. But when they came to the question of raising the money, then, he thought, everybody ought to contribute alike, according to his means. One thing was perfectly clear, the standard of living in this country for all classes would perforce be reduced one way or another. During the last thirty or forty years the standard of living had been rushed up at a prodigious rate, and with increasing wealth the standard of expenditure had gone up year by year. This country would have to return to its old and simple level of expenditure. Hadn't they better face it at once? Men could make sacrifices of luxuries and comforts in a great war as they did of life itself. This then was the time when people would be prepared to bring themselves down to the simpler level. There was a heat and a passion abroad whereby society might be moulded and remoulded to a better form. There was a great appearance of prosperity now, but it was purely artificial. We were living upon borrowed money. That could not last. We should have to pay for it. When the war was over there might even be a slight period of prosperity in order to repair its ravages, but then would come a great collapse. If the nation was wise let it be wise in time.

* * *

THE May Meetings have begun in London; but the lessened attendance, the feebleness of the public interest, and the scanty attention paid to them in the press, reveal the wisdom of curtailing them to narrow limits, and suspending, as far as possible, the social functions and the hospitable entertainment which are usually among their pleasantest features. We have neither the thought nor the money to spare for these things just now. Christian people, in the fellowship of common work, ought to be the first to set an example of simplicity and an utter disregard of the elaborate and expensive mechanism which has become part of large religious gatherings in recent years. If there are common meals let them be as simple and inexpensive as possible, and let no time or energy be spent on the decorative effects of happier days. Purple and fine linen become us ill while Lazarus lies at our gates, and is full of sores.

* * *

WE are sure that many of our readers will desire to join in the congratulations which reached Dr. James Drummond on the attainment of his eightieth birthday this week. One of the foremost scholars of his time, it is as a spiritual teacher of kindling vision and rare simplicity of character that he has exerted his greatest influence. The generations of students whom he has trained for the ministry feel that they owe him a debt which they can never repay, and the touch of his saintly spirit upon their lives does not grow weaker with the years. Since his retirement from the office of Principal of Manchester College, Oxford, ten years ago, he has enriched our religious literature with the ripe fruit of his own experience, and his voice is still heard occasionally in the pulpit. It may indeed appear to be the irony of fortune that his rare gifts have been confined to the service of a small denomination, but he has found his compensation in the atmosphere of freedom and the wide horizons of the soul. The words, which have been often on his lips and have guided all his work as an interpreter of the New Testament, reflect also the secret of his catholicity of temper and the moving earnestness of his religious appeal—"The letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life."

OUGHT WE TO JUDGE?

SOME of our friends have been repeating to us the familiar words "Judge not that ye be not judged," during the last few days. They have spoken them in a tone of reproach whenever people around them have used strong language about Germany's latest experiments in crime. They have advanced them as a plea for silence and an open mind about every form of atrocity until the war is over. Though we are quite incapable of this kind of detachment, and in ourselves, it would seem like a form of baseness, we hope that we are not without some understanding of the high-minded men and women who would guard us in this way from every root of bitterness and ill-will, and desire above all things to keep a serene faith in things that are lovely and of good report, through dark and evil days. We think, however, that they are gravely mistaken, and run no small risk of sacrificing the sternness of conscience to the softer virtues. The fact that they are in a minority and exposed to misunderstanding is, in itself, no argument against them where questions of right and wrong are concerned. But their aloofness from the plain dictates of the common conscience, and their failure to evoke any response in people who are not less devoted to high-souled goodness than themselves, may, at least, suggest the reflection that their moral weapons of silence, reserve, and personal kindness are quite unequal to the needs of a terrible public situation.

We are told that we ought not to judge for two reasons—first, because it is un-Christian; and secondly, because we are ourselves engaged in the quarrel, and cannot, as one of the litigants, decide in our own cause. Both of these pleas deserve some examination at our hands though the first is far the more important, for it affects our spiritual loyalties and the standard of thought and feeling which, as Christians, we ought to observe. Ought we then because we desire to be Christians, to refrain from saying, This thing which Germany has done is an act of gross wickedness and must have terrible punishment? We are not aware of anything in the teaching or spirit of Christ which forbids us to say this when we are confronted by crimes against honour and justice. We must not forget that Christian morals are concerned with the real world, and not with some dream-land of well-mannered people, where evil has ceased to be hideous and terrifying in its menace. We are face to face, at the present moment, with some of the most shameless forms of wrong which the world has ever known, and our business is to smite them with the swift and relentless judgments of conscience. It is not a case where the precept "Judge not that ye be not judged" applies at all, for we are not drawn aside by our own faults of temper, the lust of fault-finding, or the love of evil. There is no question of being on the scent for bad motives, or of suspecting evil where it does not really exist, or of refusing to make allowance for those who sin through weakness or stumble blindly into wrong. These shameful things have been done openly in the sight of the sun. They have been contrived with long deliberation and all the resources of wealth and power, and to the men who perpetrate them and the nation in whose service they are done, they are a source of pride and jubilation. If ever the wrath of man can be turned to the praise of God, it is when our anger is stirred against wickedness of this kind. The gentlest saints have also been terrible in judgment. The gospel of charity rests upon the granite foundation of a real distinction between right and wrong. The same pen drew up the scathing indictment against the sins of luxury and self-will in the first chapter of the Epistle to the Romans, and wrote the immortal hymn in praise of love, which suffers long and is kind. There is no contradiction between the two. They are different sides of the same spiritual valuation of life. It is the severity that is never turned aside by easy excuses or the glib phrases of a shallow philosophy, which keeps charity clean and strong and saves it from the snares of a bloodless sentimentalism.

On the other plea, that it is not for us to judge, because we are involved in the quarrel, a few words will suffice. We must be on our guard against being misled by a false metaphor. Countries which are at war are not in the same position as two litigants before a judge. The citizen is closely identified with his country; but he does not cease to be an independent moral agent. He may, indeed, be so blinded by passion that he mistakes small injuries for great crimes; but if he is a man who has been trained in habits of reasonableness and self-control, he is quite competent to pass judgment upon the general behaviour of a hostile country, especially where large questions of right and wrong and honourable dealing are concerned. This is certainly the case with international agreements in regard to the methods of warfare and practices of barbarism which have been condemned by civilised countries. Here, prejudice against our enemy may create a feeling of bitterness, but it does not invalidate the verdict that certain courses of conduct are breaches of honour, and ought to be condemned by all good men. To stand aloof from the mood of indignation which is sweeping over the country may be a sign, not so much of strong Christian principle and the desire to be just, as of moral insipidity, which is unequal to the fierce conflict with hideous wrong in which we are engaged.

We are no advocates of wild and whirling words of denunciation. We know only too well the danger of the hot anger which exhausts our strength and enervates the soul. But we are not less keenly aware of the moral futility of people who are fertile in excuses for evil-doers, and for every act of criminal outrage offer some explanation which blunts the edge of judgment. Fortunately, the wise man is not condemned to either course. "He that is spiritual judgeth all things." But to this lofty exercise of judgment, so calm, so elevating, so wise, so irreversible in its verdicts, there is no short and easy path. It is the secret of religion. It comes through daily fellowship with the greatness of God. He alone can arm us with spiritual discernment in this battle between the evil and the good, and save us from our own unreadiness to meet the stern duties of our time.

These words were written before the publication of the Report of Lord Bryce's Committee on German atrocities in Belgium. That report is a most significant confirmation of our argument that it is possible to exercise judgment, to test the truthfulness of evidence and apportion blame without the bias of prejudice and ill-will, and that to renounce the duty of doing so may be a crime against the highest interests of humanity.

Good Thoughts for Ebil Times.

RECTITUDE and uprightness are the health and purity of a man's soul. A man is then right and straight; he is whole within himself, and all things are as they should be. There should never be any transporting imaginations, no discomposure of mind, for that is a failure in the government of a man's spirit. There ought to be no eagerness or inordinacy towards the things of this world. We should not be borne down by the objects of sense. There ought to be serenity and calmness, and clear apprehensions, fair weather within... an intellectual calmness, a just balance, an equal poise of a man's mind, no perplexity of soul, no confusion, no provocation, no disturbance, no perturbation. A man should not be borne off from himself, or put out of himself, because things without him are ungoverned and disordered; for these disturbances do unhallow the mind, lay it open, and make it common. BENJAMIN WHICHCOTE.

PROSPICE.

FEAR death?—to feel the fog in my throat,

The mist in my face,
When the snows begin, and the blasts denote

I am nearing the place,
The power of the night, the press of the storm,

The post of the foe;
Where he stands, the Arch Fear in a visible form,

Yet the strong man must go:
For the journey is done and the summit attained,

And the barriers fall,
Though a battle's to fight ere the guerdon be gained,

The reward of it all.
I was ever a fighter, so—one fight more,

The best and the last!
I would hate that death bandaged my eyes, and forbore,

And bade me creep past.
No! let me taste the whole of it, fare like my peers

The heroes of old,
Bear the brunt, in a minute pay glad life's arrears

Of pain, darkness, and cold.

For sudden the worst turns the best to the brave,

The black minute's at end,
And the elements' rage, the fiend-voices that rave,

Shall dwindle, shall blend,
Shall change, shall become first a peace out of pain,

Then a light, then thy breast,
O, thou soul of my soul! I shall clasp thee again,

And with God be the rest!

ALMIGHTY GOD, whose grace doth ever keep, and whose love can never fail us, we would commit ourselves and our ways to thee in humble prayer. May we be glad in the Lord, and in the beauty of holiness worship thee. May we invite thy mercies through our charities, and thy love through our pure and unselfish affections. Make us wise to know thee, and faithful to obey thee in all things. AMEN.

"PATRIOTISM" AND "PROFITS."

Do we sufficiently realise that a struggle is going on in our midst the issues of which will be hardly less momentous for the future of our country than those of the war which we are waging abroad? It is a struggle between two opposing sets of ideals and impulses. On the one hand the great ideals of humanity, freedom, good faith, and the generous impulse to make sacrifices without stint in our devotion to these ideals. On the other hand the ideals of comfort and security; the natural, if not lofty, impulse to think first of oneself and one's family, and even to "make a bit" for oneself out of the opportunities offered by the war. On the one side courage and self-sacrifice, on the other cowardice and self-seeking. There is no evading the issue. One camp or the other we must join.

So it has come about that while we see thousands of working men, often leaving wives and families but poorly provided, confronting death and worse than death in the trenches, we also see numbers of their mates endangering their country, and the lives of their friends, by their self-seeking actions at home. We see hosts of men of wealth and position giving most freely in person and of their substance while others are making abnormal profits, often out of those necessities of life which the poor must have, and those munitions of war which are essential to the country's safety; pleading, too, sometimes that they cannot help making these profits, as if there were any law human or divine which compels a man to ask for his wares the highest price which he can get. Hundreds of doctors at great loss to themselves have left their work and their homes to go to the front, while many of the youngsters of their profession are demanding exorbitant fees before they will consent to fill the places left vacant in private practices or the hospitals. The king sets the example of a very necessary, if not very great, private sacrifice, and is followed by many. "The Trade," seeing some danger to its profits, exercises its enormous political influence and gravely endangers the national unity. In all classes of society the same thing is to be seen. England, the nation of shopkeepers, great and small, is at war with England the home of liberty, the mother of great deeds, and the birth place of great ideals. And in some quarters the spirit of party, which is largely one of self-seeking, is again raising its head, and by uninformed criticism and bitter personalities weakening the hands of those who are in authority.

Yet all these vices alike lay claim to patriotism. Indeed, it is from the lips of those who are most active in self-seeking that the word is most often to be heard. Those who act most patriotically say least about patriotism. Recently a young sergeant in the new army—who was being very simply entertained—said to me, "I don't know why people are making such a fuss about us. We are only doing our duty."

The truth is that there is a spurious and a genuine patriotism. The spurious patriot considers his country in relation to other countries and aims at securing some advantage for his own at the expense of the others. "Deutschland über Alles." This kind of patriotism is not at all inconsistent with a great loyalty to profits. For, indeed, the "good of one's country" in this sense may well coincide with the good of his own pocket.

The genuine patriot considers his country in relation to himself and asks himself what he can do for the good of his country. For him the question is not what sacrifices shall be enforced upon other countries, but what sacrifice can he make for his own.

Let us be thankful that so many genuine patriots have already been found among us; that in all classes and parties there has been shown a willingness to serve and to make sacrifices. Let us not, however, forget that we have among us also the other kind, and let us strive to open their eyes and warm their hearts. Let the plain truth be spoken. The time has come when every man who has not already faced this great issue should do so, and decide to which group he will belong; whether by his actions he will stand for patriotism or for profits. By their deeds ye shall know them. It may be that upon the decisions so to be made the salvation of our country will depend. Most certainly the salvation of the individual concerned will so depend.

IGNOTUS.

FOR THE CHILD.

THE PENT CUCKOO.

OUR great-grandmothers' great-grandfathers used to sit in the chimney-corner of a winter's night, and tell their children the Merry Tales of the Wise Men of Gotham which their mothers had told them. Thus, one of the wise men rode to market with two bushels of wheat. Thinking to ease his horse of too heavy a burden he took the sack of corn upon his own shoulders, and then remounted his horse, and so rode into town.

Another man of Gotham was on his way to Nottingham Market to sell his cheeses. As he was going down the hill to Nottingham Bridge one cheese fell out of the bag and rolled down the hill. Then the fellow laid down his wallet, and taking out the cheeses tumbled them down the hill one after another; and some ran into one bush and some into others; but, said he, "I charge you all to meet me in the market-place." So he went on to meet them there, and waited in vain till late in the day. Then quoth he, "A vengeance on them all, they knew the way well enough; they must have run beyond the market, and be now almost at York." Whereupon he did hire a horse and forthwith rode to York to seek his cheeses.

Another of the men of Gotham went to town to buy his wife a trivet. On the way back he grew tired of the weight of it, so set it down on the ground and himself upon it. "Now bear me," said he, "as long as I have borne thee." But the trivet did not move. On reaching home he told his wife that "the trivet hath three legs and I but two; I did teach him the way; let him come home if he will."

At the end of Lent, when Good Friday was come, the men of Gotham put their heads together to decide what they should do with the fish that had not been sold. One had white herring, another red herring, a third sprats, and a fourth salt fish. At last they agreed to cast all their fish together into the town pond, so that by next year each man might have his own with increase. The following Lent they came and dragged the pond, but all they caught was one great eel. "A mischief on this eel," they cried, "for he hath eaten up all our fish! What shall we do with him?" "Let us drown him," said one. "Be it so," said all. So they took the eel to another pond and cast him in to be drowned.

We might also tell of the wheelbarrow that was bitten by a mad dog which the people of Gotham chained up in case it, too, should be mad and bite somebody. Of the countrymen who raked for the moon reflected in a pond thinking it was a Cheshire cheese; wherefore the Swindon football players call themselves "Moonrakers" unto this day. Of the villagers returning home with a bag of porridge-meal, who coming to the mill-race thought the water was boiling; so emptied the bag of meal into the stream, and presently jumping in to eat it were drowned. Of the millers who, finding that there was not sufficient wind to turn the sails of the two windmills of Gotham, pulled one of them down; and of the men who sat upon a gate, but when they had a mind to get down could not do so, for they had put their feet between the bars and their legs were mixed, and they knew not one man's from another's.

And yet one more tale of the men of Gotham I must tell. On a springtime when the cuckoo had come back, "Now," said they, "let us pen in the cuckoo so that she stays and sings all the year; for as long as she sings so long will it be summer." Then they watched and saw her sitting upon a thorn-bush on the top of a hill crying "Cuckoo!" So they brought up hurdles and furze and made a hedge round about the crown of the hill compassing her in, and said: "Sing here all the year and thou shalt lack neither meat nor drink." But the Cuckoo thought otherwise and flew away over the hedge. "A vengeance on her," said they: "if only we had made our hedge higher!"

Such is the famous story of the cuckoo pent or penned in, which has set wiser heads than yours or mine a-thinking. For there is a reason, they say, for everything. What, then, is the reason or origin of this quaint tale of old times? In part the explanation is clear enough. The cuckoo and the summer are inseparable. They come and go together. We can hardly think of one without the other. But the hedge encircling the hill on which the bird perches introduces a new idea. Two things may have got mixed up as often happens in stories. Now when the Angles and Saxons invaded this country, the Britons, who lived in England at the time, had to run for it, for they were not strong enough to resist the invaders. Instead they took to the hills and mountains, where, to some extent, they held their own; and traditions of the Celts or Britons on the hills surrounded by ditches and thickets, and country notions about the cuckoos that come and go with the summer, have got intermixed. There are to-day many places in England and Wales where the people are said to have hedged in the cuckoo, whereas it was ancient Britons which their ancestors penned up in the hills. Thus do we owe to the foolish wise men of Gotham a footprint, as it were, of human history. Jolly old bumpkins! A thousand thanks for breeding generations of honest laughter! How much wiser ye in your so great love of the bird and the summer that you must needs have them with you for ever, than the fellow who last summer, seeing that two cuckoos were wont to perch upon the garden gate, must needs get a gun and shoot them! He thought he'd better knock them over, he said—as though they were burglars or boa-constrictors. He let me have them dead, who would have loved them living, and now their bones rest beneath my apple-tree. It was poor comfort, but all I had to offer; and the apple-tree is coming into bloom earlier than any in my garden. Have the cuckoos among the roots anything to do with that? At any rate, cuckoos are better gardeners than most, for they eat up myriads of caterpillars, and woolly-bears which scarce another bird will touch.

MEMORIAL NOTICES.

MR. WALTER HOLLAND.

WE regret to record the death of Mr. Walter Holland, the well-known ship owner of Liverpool, which took place after a long illness, on Saturday, May 10, in his 73rd year. He was a son of Mr. Charles Holland, who belonged to an old Knutsford family, and was born in Hope Street, Liverpool, in 1842. At the age of 16 he was apprenticed to the firm of Messrs. W. J. Lamport & George Holt. In 1860 the well-known firm of Messrs. Lamport & Holt was founded, and in 1874 Mr. Holland was taken into partnership, a position which he retained till his retirement in 1911. An excellent and successful man of business he was engaged in many useful enterprises without taking any prominent part in the public life of the city, for which he had little inclination. He will, however, be remembered for his generous and discriminating philanthropy. No institution was dearer to his heart than the Liverpool Domestic Mission. He was treasurer for thirty-five years, and in that capacity watched over all its interests with unflinching generosity. The splendid and spacious Mission buildings in Mill Street were largely his creation. While they enshrined the philanthropic spirit of many Liverpool families they may truly be regarded as Mr. Holland's best memorial. He was a life-long Unitarian, and a member of the Ullet Road Church. The funeral took place on Wednesday at the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth.

MR. AND MRS. J. C. MACKY.

THE sad and deplorable news that Mr. and Mrs. J. C. Macky went down on the Lusitania will arouse feelings of sincere sorrow among the Unitarian community in New Zealand—feelings which will be widely shared in this country. Both had hoped to be present at the Anniversary Meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association; indeed, they had so planned their journey, after visiting New York, in order to be in London during Whit-week. Mr. Macky was a devoted and generous supporter of the Unitarian Church in Auckland from its formation. A convert from orthodoxy, he became deeply attached to the principles and faith of Unitarianism. Mr. and Mrs. Macky were delightful people to know; they were charming hosts, and full of zeal for all things good and true. To their daughter, Mrs. Jellie, wife of the Rev. W. Jellie of Southport, and to the other members of the family, we would tender our sympathy in the tragic loss that has befallen them.

THE Annual General Meetings of the National Education Association will be held at the Westminster Palace Hotel on Tuesday, May 18, at 4 o'clock. Lord Sheffield will preside, and Sir W. Ryland Adkins, M.P., will open a discussion on 'The Education of Children and the War.'

LONDON DOMESTIC MISSION SOCIETY.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE Annual Meeting of the London Domestic Mission Society was held on Monday, May 10, at the Unitarian Church, Clarence Road, Kentish Town, Mr. Philip Roscoe in the chair. The Rev. H. Gow, hon. secretary, read the eightieth annual report of the committee, which pays a warm tribute to the three missionaries and their wives for their devoted work, which has never been more urgently needed than during these strenuous and anxious days.

The Treasurer, Mr. P. Roscoe, in his capacity of chairman, asked that the financial statement might be taken as read, the only point to which attention was called being the fact that the Society continues largely to exceed its income. In moving the adoption of the report he recalled the fact that eighty years ago, when the Society was founded, William IV. was king and Lord Melbourne was prime minister. They had moved a long way from the events of that time, but the missionaries and helpers all through those eighty years had striven to carry out the work which had been originally planned for them, and though their methods had changed, as was inevitable, the ideals at the back of their efforts had always kept their freshness and youth. In such a Society they could only go on in the spirit of proving all things, and holding fast to that which is good, thus embodying the principles of the best Liberalism and Conservatism alike.

The Rev. J. C. Odgers, who had preached the special Mission Sermon at Clarence Road Church on Sunday morning, seconded the adoption of the report in a speech full of reminiscences of the days when he was himself connected with the church at Kentish Town, and acted as secretary to the Society. The work of the Missions, he said, showed that they possessed a remarkable power of adaptability to the needs of the time, and that a large range of activity was going on amongst them. These Domestic Missions were part and parcel of their religious movement, and their record was woven into their denominational history. Referring to the war, and more particularly to the number of young men that their churches and missions had sent into the army, Mr. Odgers said that they could not see them go without sore hearts, especially when they realised that many of them would not return, but the loss they shared with others had deepened their sympathies and strengthened religious feeling as nothing had ever done before.

Miss Withall pleaded for a reconsideration of the attitude of the Society towards "the poor," whose moral and religious welfare and the amelioration of their condition they were pledged, by the language of their constitution, to regard as the object of their endeavours. They were too much occupied with the idea of kindness to the poor, and too little with the ideal of social justice, and if they were animated by a more democratic attitude it would be in keeping with the aims of a free religious faith, and conducive to the promotion of a sense of the real brotherhood and sisterhood of humanity.

The resolution was carried unanimously.

The Rev. F. H. Jones moved a resolution expressing renewed confidence in the principles of the Domestic Mission, and appreciation of the work of the missionaries, their wives and helpers. The Domestic Missions, he said, could not attempt to do something else until they had carried out all they had planned to do, and he was sure that none of them in this world could do better work than that comprised in the moral and religious improvement of the poor. It might sound a little patronising, though it seemed a strange thing that in a Christian community the fact that a man was poor should be regarded in any sense as a thing to be ashamed of. "Blessed are the poor." They used words in a perverted sense, as was shown by the discredit which had been cast on "charity," as if it was something they wished to get rid of and to be proud of trying to abolish. In what spirit were they to go to those who needed help and sympathy if not in the spirit of that greatest of Christian virtues? Legislation was doing very much nowadays to alter the conditions of life for the poor, and no one would wish to see its usefulness in that direction restricted. They could not make a man good by act of Parliament, but they could make it a little easier for him to be honest, and sober, and give him better opportunities of living a happier life. All this, however, took a long time, and meanwhile there were people all around who had not as yet received the benefits of such legislation, and never would, and surely they must do some little thing for these poorer members of society as they went along?

The Rev. H. Gow seconded the resolution, and emphasised the fact that the Domestic Missions were not intended primarily to obtain social justice. They all felt that there were many things which should be altered in their methods of work, but nothing was more repugnant to them than any idea of patronising the poor. At the root of all their activities was the desire to send the message of Christ into all the dark and sordid and sinful quarters of their great towns. They needed more of the evangelising spirit, for they had to a certain extent lost touch with religion. People understood the idea of working for social justice, but they did not fully understand the fact that before God all men and women were brothers and sisters. It was to bring that ideal of human brotherhood into the lives of others that they worked with a sense of personal consecration which nothing but religion could supply.

The missionaries—the Rev. F. Summers, Dingley Place; the Rev. W. H. Rose, Rhyl Street; and the Rev. A. Golland, Bell Street, whose reports are included in the annual report—spoke of the progress of their work, each one emphasising strongly its essentially religious character, and the personal rewards which are the result of the happy relationships established between the workers and those for whom they labour. In spite of the anxieties caused by the war, and the fact that the very poor are poorer than they ever were before, the note of optimism rather than of depression was conspicuous in their report of the year's work. Mr. Rose referred specially to Mr. Gow's untiring efforts as secretary of the Society, and their great regret that they were losing the strong support which they needed, and which he had always given them.

Mr. Ronald Jones moved a resolution appointing the committee and the officers for the ensuing year which was seconded by Dr. Blake Odgers, K.C., and passed unanimously. The Rev. F. K. Freeston succeeds the Rev. H. Gow as hon. secretary. Mrs. Eveleigh moved a vote of thanks to the Rev. J. Collins Odgers for preaching the annual sermon, and to the Rev. F. Hankinson and the Clarence Road congregation for their hospitality. The resolution was seconded by the Rev. R. T. Herford. Mr. Hankinson made a short speech in reply.

THE LIVERPOOL DOMESTIC MISSION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE Seventy-Eighth Annual Meeting of the Liverpool Domestic Mission was held on Thursday evening, 6 May, at the Mill Street premises. Mr. F. C. Bowring, President, was in the chair, and among those present were Sir William B. Bowring and Lady Bowring, His Honour Judge Thomas (Liverpool County Court), Mrs. Thomas, Mr. Charles Booth, jun., Mr. Lawrence D. Holt, (Deputy Hon. Treasurer), Mr. C. Sydney Jones, Alderman R. R. Meade-King, Mr. R. H. Armstrong (Hon. Secretary), Mr. Hugh R. Rathbone, Mr. Herbert R. Rathbone, and the Revs. J. C. Odgers, S. A. Mellor, and H. D. Roberts, the Rev. T. Lloyd Jones and Mr. Joseph Anderton (Missionaries), and the Rev. J. W. Saunders (Missionary Fellow).

Mr. R. H. Armstrong presented the report of the committee, which recorded with pride the fact that seventy past and present members of the Sunday school and workers had joined the colours on sea and land. The death of Mr. Philip Holt and Mr. Alfred Booth, two of the oldest subscribers, were severe losses to the mission. Regret was expressed at the continued illness of Mr. Walter Holland, who for forty years had been a member of the committee, and for over thirty years had been hon. treasurer. The income had been overspent by £224 14s. 1d. The reports of the missionaries, the Revs. T. Lloyd Jones and J. W. Saunders, and Mr. Joseph Anderton, were eloquent of good work accomplished.

The President, in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, intimated that after five years' occupancy of the presidential office, he was reluctantly obliged to resign the position. It was, he said, gratifying to him that during his term of office he had been able to watch the growth and development of the mission in various directions. In no way had it gone back. He would be pleased, by way of commemorating his presidency, to pay off the debit balance on the past year. He urged the wisdom of establishing an endowment fund for the Mission, the interest on which would go towards meeting the yearly expenses. A number of friends had promised about £500 towards that object.

Mr. Arthur W. Hall seconded, and the motion was carried.

Judge Thomas proposed a resolution assuring the missionaries and the voluntary workers of warm appreciation and sympathy in their efforts. He cordially commended the work of the Mission. The war, he said, had led people to realise, as perhaps never before, the real community of interest which bound the poorest to the highest members of society. That would be one of the encouragements for their work in the future. He had no doubt also that one of the effects of the war would be to strengthen the missionaries in their efforts to cope with the drink evil. "We have had read to us to-night," Judge Thomas continued, "the eloquent words of one of the first resolutions passed at one of the first meetings. Those resolutions should be read by you all. They are in themselves pieces of literature. They express in admirable language the object and scope of this Mission. The object and scope of the Mission are to go about among the poorest of the community, to enable them by example, precept, and opportunity to live nobler lives, to form better habits, and to be good and useful citizens. Now we all know that that cannot be done merely by teaching. It can only be attained by teaching which is backed by opportunity; and this Mission, with its fine buildings, its multifarious activities, of which some account has been given you to-night, gives that opportunity. It gives to the poorest here around us some measure of chance, of mental improvement, of physical improvement, and of reasonable social recreation. It gives them the opportunity of coming into contact with men like Mr. Lloyd Jones, to meet whom is a tonic, and who is the embodiment of social constructive energy, and gives them the opportunity, in the many associations connected with it, of learning how to work in concert, to co-operate their social forces for a common good, and to live not only on behalf of themselves but on behalf of others. These are the true objects of all reformers. At the bottom of every social reformation must lie the upbuilding of the individual character. The true greatness and well-being of a state depend upon the character of its individual citizens, and unless we can uplift them and teach them to live noble and useful lives, then all the legislation in the world will be of no effect. It is in recognition of the efforts of this Mission, and of its missionaries, who so worthily carry out the objects for which it was founded, that I have to propose the resolution to-night, knowing well that you recognise how devoted the efforts of Mr. Lloyd Jones, who I think will soon complete a third of a century among you, have been in the past—a recognition that the work they are doing is the work which is best calculated to have the most useful results for the benefit of the state of any that can be rendered to any community in any way whatsoever."

The Rev. Dr. Mellor seconded the motion, and paid a hearty tribute to the excellent work the Mission was doing in both a social and spiritual sense.

Mr. Hugh R. Rathbone supported, and the resolution was carried.

The missionaries (the Rev. T. Lloyd Jones and J. W. Saunders and Mr. Jos. Anderton) responded.

On the motion of Mr. F. Robinson, seconded by Miss M'Connell, officers and committee were elected. Mr. Herbert R. Rathbone was elected president.

Thanks were voted to Mr. F. C. Bowring for his services as president for five years, on the proposition of Mr. Herbert R. Rathbone, seconded by the Rev. H. D. Roberts.

THE WESTERN UNION OF UNITARIAN AND FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCHES.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE Annual Assembly of the Western Union of Unitarian and Free Christian Churches was held at the Conigre Chapel, Trowbridge, on Wednesday, May 5. It was attended by fifty ministers and delegates and several of the subscribers. The Rev. J. H. Weatherall, the Assembly Preacher, and the President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, Mr. J. F. L. Brunner, M.P., were welcomed as visitors. Great regret was expressed that the announced representative of the National Conference, the Rev. H. Gow, was prevented from being present by illness. The day's proceedings began with the Business Meeting at noon. In the absence of the President, Capt. C. H. Goodland, who is with his regiment in Burma, and of Mr. J. Kenrick Champion, the Treasurer, on account of illness, Mr. W. Hall presided. The Committee's report and the Treasurer's statement of accounts were received and adopted on the proposition of the Chairman, seconded by Rev. A. E. O'Connor. On the motion of the Secretary, seconded by Mr. F. G. Long, grants amounting to £100 were voted to various churches in the provinces, and in view of the increased cost of living, special war grants amounting to £50 were voted to ministers of congregations where the stipends are smallest. The Rev. W. H. Burgess proposed and Mr. James Duckworth seconded the election of officers and committee as follows:—President, Mr. E. J. Blake; Treasurer, Mr. J. Kenrick Champion; Secretary, Rev. Rudolf Davis; Sunday School Secretary, Mr. E. S. Goodland; Committee, Rev. G. F. Beckh, Mr. W. Harvey Blake, Rev. A. Cunliffe Fox, Mr. T. Lee Lloyd, Rev. J. McDowell, Rev. C. E. Pike, Mr. E. P. Rendall, Mr. C. W. Washbourne; and Auditors, Mr. F. E. Gillard and Mr. A. Hartland. The President, Mr. P. J. Worsley, Rev. J. McDowell and Rev. C. E. Pike were elected to the Advisory Committee. The Chairman read a letter from the Secretary of the Trowbridge and District Evangelical Free Church Council enclosing the following resolution adopted at their last meeting:—"That we send the delegates

Christian Churches, meeting at their annual conference next Wednesday, at Trowbridge, our very hearty expression of goodwill, and our hope that they will realise all they expect in the Assembly." A message of hearty thanks and appreciation was sent to the Council. The Rev. A. N. Blatchford being about to retire from the active ministry, and having resigned his position on the Western Union Committee after being a member for forty-six years, the Chairman proposed, the Rev. J. McDowell seconded and the Rev. G. F. Beckh supported the presentation to Mr. Blatchford of an address, which had been illuminated and bound in book form by Messrs. Cedric Chivers & Co., Ltd., Bath.

"The assembly," the address concludes, "makes grateful and affectionate acknowledgment of the wise and gentle spirit of a venerable leader, and of the vigorous and eloquent vindication of Truth, Liberty, and Religion, as the great emancipators of humanity, which, on fitting occasion, has fallen from your lips. It is the ardent hope of the assembly that you and Mrs. Blatchford may journey together in the evening of your days towards a golden sunset."

The Rev. A. N. Blatchford said he must not be regarded as speaking affectedly if he said how really very difficult it was for him to express adequately the feelings of gratitude with which their kindness that day had filled him; gratitude no less for the friendliness, for all the loving co-operation, the patience and forbearance they had given to him in times past, whether as secretary, president, or as a humble member of the Committee. He was grateful to them for all. It had been a happiness to him to work with them. All that he could say was best summed up in the words of Oliver Cromwell concerning the old Ironsides, "They were lovely company."

At the lunch which followed in the schoolroom, Mr. F. A. Bullock, minister of the Trowbridge congregation, presided, and, after "The King," proposed "The Western Union," for which Mr. W. Harvey Blake responded. "Civil and Religious Liberty all the World Over," was proposed by Mr. Councillor Docking and responded to by the Rev. W. Holmshaw and the Rev. B. Vaughan Pryce, pastor of the Tabernacle Church. Following the lunch, the Rev. J. H. Weatherall, conducted the service and preached the sermon in the Chapel. The deep simplicity of his heart-searching appeal made a great impression upon the congregation. The collection for the Union funds amounted to £4 13s. 7d. A public meeting in the Chapel followed. The chair was taken by the Rev. Rudolf Davis and addresses were given by the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, Mr. J. F. L. Brunner, M.P., the Rev. J. H. Weatherall and the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor. A hearty vote of thanks to the Trowbridge congregation for its hospitable reception of the assembly, proposed by the Rev. S. H. Street, seconded by the Rev. G. S. Woods, and responded to by Mr. F. A. Bullock and Mr. E. Taylor, closed the proceedings. On the following morning a ministers' meeting was held, attended by seventeen ministers, and the Rev. J. H. Weatherall read a paper on 'The Psychology of Preaching,' which was followed by a discussion.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION

THE Sunday School Association have always tried to get as their speaker at the Annual Meeting some one who would not merely give a talk on Sunday School work, but who was qualified both by training and experience to give valuable help. This year Miss May Pelton, Lecturer at the West Hill Training Institute for Sunday School workers, Birmingham, has very kindly agreed to speak, and her subject will be 'Spirit and Method.' Those who were at the last Oxford Summer Session will not have forgotten Miss Pelton's address there and her very charming personality. It will also be remembered that she was one of those chosen to give a paper at the World's Sunday School Convention at Zurich, and this was given again by special request at Oxford. "West Hill" has been started with the special idea of providing better trained Sunday School teachers, especially for the primary and junior departments. The course of training includes both theory and practice, and comprises lectures on the Bible, child study, the history and principles of education and methods of teaching; demonstrations and practical work are a special feature. The present Institute is already much too small to accommodate all the students who are anxious to attend, and a much larger one is being built. This movement is in itself of the utmost interest to Sunday School teachers, and any one coming from there is bound to be interesting. It is to be hoped that a large number of delegates will be present and that the teachers in the London schools will also take this opportunity of training themselves further for their work. Miss Pelton is further well known in connection with the "Camp Fire Girls" in this country, and in these days when Girls' Own Brigades are coming much to the fore, the romantic and picturesque ceremonial and equipment connected with the Camp Fire should be of interest.

THE Rev. F. Summers writes:—

"Will you please allow me to say that the London Unitarian Ministers' Meeting has arranged a Conference for the Thursday morning of Whit week at 11 o'clock at Essex Hall, when Dr. Carpenter, D.D., will speak on the war as it has affected ministers and congregations? All ministerial brethren are cordially invited to attend. The Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A., will preside; and I desire to add that the Secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in the letter which he has issued to all ministers has intimated that those who have filled in and returned the form which accompanied the letter will receive an invitation to luncheon following the Conference."

SIR J. HERBERT ROBERTS, M.P., will preside at the Annual Meeting of the Anglo-Indian Temperance Association, which will be held on Wednesday, May 19, at 5 P.M., at Caxton Hall, Westminster. The speakers will include the Bishop of Lincoln, the Right Hon. Ameer Ali, the first Indian member of the Privy Council, and Mrs. W. S. Caine.

THE ninety-ninth public anniversary of the Peace Society will be held at the Friends' Meeting House (Devonshire House), Bishopsgate, E.C., on Monday, 17 May, 1915. The chair will be taken at 7 p.m., by Mr. Joseph King, M.P., supported by Miss A. Maude Royden, Mr. T. Richardson, M.P., Dr. Henry T. Hodgkin, the Rev. John Hunter, D.D., the Rev. W. E. Orchard, D.D., the Rev. Richard Roberts, and other friends of peace.

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Accrington.—The Rev. H. D. Roberts of Liverpool conducted the Sunday School Anniversary Services at the Unitarian Free Church on May 2. The collection amounted to over £11.

Ballyhemlin.—The Annual May Sermon was preached on Sunday afternoon, May 9. The Meeting House was simply and tastefully decorated with wild flowers. The collection, which amounted to £2 6s. 6d., was on behalf of the Sunday School Association Motor Ambulance.

Blackpool.—The Rev. H. Bodell Smith is terminating his ministry at the Unitarian Free Church, South Shore, Blackpool, to the great regret of the congregation. He has accepted an invitation to the Unitarian Church, Nelson.

Halifax.—The Sunday School Anniversary in connection with Northgate End Chapel was held on Sunday, May 9. The Rev. E. L. H. Thomas, B.A. (Minister of Cross Street Chapel, Manchester), conducted the services. In the afternoon, at 2.30, a Scholars' Service was held, when an address was given by Mr. N. Roxby Hall (of the Secondary School, Halifax). Collections at the Services in aid of the School Funds amounted to £22 6s.

Montreal.—Throughout the Dominion the Lusitania outrage has stimulated recruiting. There were many references from the pulpit to the crime on Sunday. One which attracted a great deal of attention was that of the Rev. Samuel Bullock, pastor of the Unitarian Church, an American, who served as Chaplain with the first Illinois Cavalry in the Spanish-American War. The Rev. S. Bullock said:—I have furled my American flag, and never again will I fling it to the free winds until my country shall demand reparation and recognition of the rights of its citizens to sail in unquestioned safety in any waters of the globe. So long as the country itself is not at war I have laid my medal aside, and I shall not wear it again until it shall have been demonstrated that my country, in its passion for dollars, has not lost sight of its honour."

Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association.—The Spring Conference of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association was held in the Wellington Street Church, Stockton-on-Tees, on Monday, May 10. Representatives were present from most of the churches on the Roll. In the unavoidable absence of the President, Sir Joseph B. Ellis, the chair was taken by the Rev. Alfred Hall of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, who took the opportunity of welcoming Miss Phillips, the recently appointed minister at Carlisle; and the Rev. J. H. Smith, who has accepted a temporary appointment at Middlesbrough. A paper was read by the Rev. E. T. Russell, B.A. of Edinburgh, on the subject: 'At Sea, with Chart and Compass Gone.' It provoked a spirited discussion. In the evening a Public Meeting was held in the church over which the Rev. Arthur Scruton presided. Speeches on set topics were delivered by the Revs. E. T. Russell, Alfred Hall, J. H. Smith, J. B. Robinson, and Mr. W. Stephenson, the Lay-Minister at Sunderland. In the early part of the meeting a warm welcome was given to Miss Phillips, who responded in feeling terms.

Oldbury.—The Annual Meeting in connection with the Unitarian Meeting House was held at the Free Schools on Monday evening, Mr. R. W. Smith, Chairman of the Church Committee, presiding. Mr. A. Claude Jephcott, Assistant Secretary, read the report, and Mr. A. Burgess, Secretary and Treasurer, the financial statement. The Minister, the Rev. H. C. Hawkins, said he was happy to feel that the past twelve months had been so full of activity, and that the Sunday School had achieved such a vigorous existence. In the last Annual Report a large increase in the number both of scholars and teachers had been recorded. He was glad to tell them that they had almost maintained those numbers, the losses being compensated for by new members. Some renovations had also been carried out which had rendered the class-rooms more comfortable and convenient. The Guild of the Good Shepherd, established over thirty years ago, had been revived, and would be affiliated with the Midland Guilds Union. Five present members and three past members of their church, and a good number of friends of the congregation had joined the colours as a result of the war. The reports were adopted on the motion of Mr. George Sutherland, seconded by Mr. E. Ray. It was stated that the Committee had decided to place a tablet on the walls of the church commemorating the late Mr. William Morgan's devoted work, and to provide, in addition, a new set of prayer books. In the course of the evening a presentation was made to Mr. Alfred Burgess—who has acted for many years as Secretary and Treasurer of the church, and for over thirty-five years as Sunday School Superintendent—and to Mrs. Burgess. Mr. Lewis Lloyd, Hon. Secretary of the Midland Sunday School Association, and Mr. G. Sutherland, spoke appreciatively of Mr. Burgess's fine record; and Mr. Burgess, in reply, said he rejoiced in the cause which had done so much for him, and in having been connected with the only free school in the town established long years before the nation thought of providing education for the people.

Rawtenstall.—The Sunday School Anniversary was held on Sunday, May 9, when the preacher was the Rev. R. Nicol Cross of Leeds. The collections amounted to over £37.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

OXFORD AND THE KING'S EXAMPLE.

A number of resident members of Oxford University have signed the following recommendation:—"Having regard to the command of his Majesty the King, 'that no wines, spirits, or beer shall be consumed in any of his Majesty's houses,' we earnestly desire to recommend the King's example for general adoption during the continuance of the present war." Among the signatories are the Principal of Jesus, the Warden of New College, the Provost of Oriel, the Rector of Exeter, the Rev. A. J. Carlyle, (Rector of the City Church), Dr. J. Drummond, Dr. Buchanan Gray, H. W. Garrod, Prof. Geldart, Dr. L. P. Jacks, Sir William Osler, Canon B. H. Streeter, Mr. A. L. Smith and Mr. A. Sidgwick.

WOMEN IN CHURCH WORK.

At the London Diocesan Conference which was concluded last Thursday, a resolution moved by the Bishop of Kensington and seconded by Prebendary Pennefather, asking the Conference to adopt the rules for the representation of the laity adopted in July last by the Representative Church Council, was carried by 196 votes to 84. These rules give women power to vote at the election of parochial church councils, and the Bishop described this concession as a tardy act of justice.

WOMEN AS STRETCHER BEARERS IN THE FIRING LINE.

Though the suggestion may not be practicable from the point of view of the military authorities, Englishwomen will have read with pride the letter signed by Miss Margaret Ashton, Lady Betty Balfour, Lady Courtney of Penwith, Mrs. Cadbury, Mrs. Despard, Mrs. Meynell, Lady Mary Murray, Miss Rathbone, Lady Selborne, Mrs. Trevelyan and others, recently sent to the press, advocating that a number of carefully selected women should be employed as stretcher bearers in the firing line. The signatories point out that in spite of the efforts of those engaged in Red Cross work many of our soldiers lie wounded on the field for very long periods after they have fallen, and it needs but little imagination to picture the sufferings endured by them as they wait for the succour which does not come, till death puts an end to the agony. It is suggested that these women should be dressed in some uniform which should be as conspicuous and as easily distinguished as possible from a long distance. The danger of being deliberately fired upon or of being hit by a stray bullet or by a shot from a long-distance battery is not over-looked, but it is thought that the type of German officer or soldier who would attempt to pick off a woman engaged on such work is not common, and that, in any case, the greatness of the need justifies an experiment which would not be likely to fail for lack of volunteers.

DAYLIGHT SAVING.

Mr. H. W. M. Willett has written to the press reminding us that if the bill in which his late father was so much interested had passed into law, it would have come into operation on Sunday, 18 April, and we should now have been enjoying the benefit of an extra hour of daylight at the end of each day. By the operation of a Daylight Saving Act the clock time of sunrise and sunset would have been one hour later than at present. "How much this would have been appreciated in the present time of restricted lighting and darkened streets," he says, "requires no enlargement upon by me. The Government's energies are at the present moment required on measures which are more vital to the country's welfare than the Daylight Saving Bill, but I venture to express the hope that this measure may have the serious attention of Parliament as soon as a convenient opportunity occurs, when the war is over."

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.

OUR news from the Belgian Hospitals continues to be quite satisfactory so far as the usefulness and the growing importance of our work are concerned. Several interesting letters from France have reached us this week. Mr. Kelland, who has acted as our representative in France from the beginning, has made a long round of visits and is keeping us in close touch with the hospitals which are receiving our help and with fresh needs as they arise. The general impression is that the demands upon our Fund are bound to increase as long as the severe fighting continues. Mr. Kelland reports that in many hospitals the stocks are alarmingly low, but they put great faith in Mrs. Allen. He has also been able to visit the convalescent Belgian soldiers in a camp further south, to which we made some reference a short time ago, and to take them a large consignment of invalid food and clothing. He was received with the utmost cordiality and a letter of thanks has since been received.

In regard to the civilian work, we are glad to be able to report that a building for the hospital has been found in a suitable locality, and the equipment will be sent out as fast as possible. Several cases of clothing have been delivered already and an ambulance and a motor-car are on their way, if they have not actually arrived. In the disturbed districts close to the firing line work of this kind is full of difficulty, the transit of goods is often delayed for military purposes and news travels slowly. But we can assure our readers that this branch of our work is receiving our most earnest attention and everything possible is being done on our part to organise the help, which is so sorely needed, as quickly as possible.

THE war news has been eclipsed this week by the impending political changes at home. It has been decided to set up a coalition ministry of all the parties and all the talents in place of the Liberal ministry, which has steered the country through ten months of crisis, not indeed without mistakes, but with energy and success. It is not easy to disentangle the various reasons which have led to this strange situation. Apart from the personal friction at the Admiralty there has been a revival of captious criticism and unworthy attempts to discredit the ministry in a section of the press. The failure of the Government to beat down opposition to every effective proposal for curbing the menace of drink has also told heavily against them; and they have had to bear the brunt of the widespread feeling of disappointment at the slow progress of the war. Many people expected a successful coup on a large scale to open the spring campaign, and are inclined to grumble loudly at the Government because it has not come off. Most criticism of this kind is ignorant and unfair, and it is very easy to make it after the event. We are engaged in a new kind of warfare, and it is doubtful whether any amount of prudence and foresight could have forestalled the costly lessons of experience. But we cannot restore the complete and enthusiastic confidence of the whole country simply by pointing out that hitherto the Government has done well or that much of the grumbling is factious or insincere. There is no time for argument or defence. The country must be mobilised for action and kept at all hazards from influences which disintegrate and divide. It is impatient of the party feeling and the personal recriminations of ordinary political life, when the demand is for leadership into action.

If a Coalition Government were likely to increase our national strength and efficiency, no patriotic citizen could speak a word against it. As an abstract proposition there is a great deal to be said for it. It is when we try to imagine it at work among the actual conditions of our parliamentary life that misgivings begin to arise. It is possible that under the glamour of the word "National," party feeling will be silenced in Parliament for a short time; but then the various groups in the House of Commons will recover their sense of individuality, and freed from the restraint of party discipline they are only too likely to organise themselves for independent action. Even a Committee of Public Safety cannot avoid matters of acute controversy. It may have to deal with conscription, with the control of the drink traffic, and with many other topics of domestic concern. Will it have the requisite machinery at its command to ensure a parliamentary majority? This is a matter upon which we have no previous experience to guide us, but the stability, and consequently, the public usefulness of the new form of Government depend upon it.

UNLESS all the omens are strangely at fault, this week will see the great decision of Italy to take the side of the Allies in the war. The Cabinet crisis last week filled many people here with foreboding. They spoke darkly about the bad news from Rome, and even indulged in some sharp criticism of the failure of our diplomacy. It has been an instructive lesson in the danger of trying to dogmatise about events before they are over. We had a shrewd suspicion that the resignation of the Italian ministry was a method of strengthening their hold upon Parliament and the country, and this has proved to be right. That Italians should join with us as brothers-in-arms in this great conflict for European liberty, is a matter of pride and delight. There are strong reasons why many other countries should preserve their neutrality, however deeply they may sympathise with our aims; but for Italy this is not so. Her own interests are deeply involved, and there are elements of lofty idealism in her people which forbid her simply to wait upon events or to stand idly by while the sacred rights of freedom and nationality are profaned. She has not learned the lesson of Mazzini and Garibaldi in vain.

* * *

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY has sent a letter to the Prime Minister, in which he points out that national anger seeks utterance in action, but that it must be guarded from taking the contemptible shape of senseless violence, or the desire to retaliate. "There are," he says, "great veins of service still untapped," and he suggests a further use of the organised religious forces of the country.

On behalf of all [he writes], whether men or women, for whom I have any right to speak, and to my knowledge they belong to many denominations, I assure you of our eager wish to make available for the public service whatever knowledge, whatever influence, whatever material resources we possess. We have urged that all those who can appropriately, and to the public advantage, join the combatant forces, should enrol themselves forthwith. Upon those who are precluded by age or health or circumstance from that form of service we invite you to call without hesitation for such aid as they can render by brain or hand, by voice or pen. We await your call, whenever and wherever the occasion bids you make it.

* * *

To this appeal Mr. Asquith has replied as follows:—

"Let not the sun go down upon your wrath" is a precept which rebukes the petty, personal, unreasoning quarrels of social and national life. But it has no application when the issue is such that freedom, honour, humanity itself is at stake. I therefore, heartily welcome your suggestion that the Church and the responsible leaders of religious opinion and feeling should enforce what has become the primary duty of every subject of the King—to contribute loyally, and without any reserve, any and every form of service to the greatest and worthiest cause in which either the fortunes or the conscience of the Empire have ever been engaged.

* * *

THERE is one topic mentioned in the letter of the Archbishop, where it seems to us that some slight correction of language is needed. The matter is also referred to by two correspondents in our own columns to-day. We agree entirely that any policy based upon the desire simply to retaliate would be senseless and wrong, and we do not think that such a course would find favour with any body of responsible people in this country. We say this in face of the fact that Lord Kitchener has announced that, owing to the persistent use of poisonous gases by the Germans, the French and English armies must claim the right to employ the same weapon. We are not dealing here with a threat to meet outrage with outrage and wrong with wrong. No one proposes to imitate the German atrocities in Belgium or the sinking of the Lusitania. The use of poisonous gases was horrible first and foremost because it was a particularly bad offence against honour. It was a breach of a military compact which we loyally observed, and the other side violated with deliberate trickery and cunning. That compact exists no longer, Germany has torn it to shreds, and for this war we are in exactly the same position as we should be if it had never been made.

* * *

WE may amplify our argument by suggesting that high explosives or the use of aircraft in war might also have been prohibited by the Hague conventions. Should we then have been compelled to keep all our aeroplanes in their hangars while Germany sent her Zeppelins abroad, or to confine our artillery to the use of shrapnel while the enemy shattered our defences to bits with lyddite shells? As soon as these conventions about weapons are violated by one side, the question of conscience is annulled and it becomes a matter purely for military decision. Otherwise our soldiers would be compelled to fight with one hand tied behind their backs and unscrupulous scoundrelism might be placed in a position of permanent advantage. In any case it is a fatal confusion of language to speak of the policy announced by Lord Kitchener as an atrocity in the sense that the sinking of unarmed fishing boats is an atrocity. It is not even an act of retaliation, for it is not dictated by malevolence or spite. If it is put into force at all we may be sure that it will be with strong reluctance and simply as a matter of military necessity.

* * *

THE London Tramway Strike is a disgraceful business. At ordinary times the action of the men would be quite indefensible. To hold up the daily life of a vast community and inflict immeasurable inconvenience upon its poorest members until all the resources of arbitration have been exhausted, is a crime against good citizenship. At the present time it is something worse, it is treason against the state; for it dissipates energy, it hinders necessary labour for the war, and it reveals the presence of a group of malcontents who place their own interest and convenience above the imperative claims of public duty. If we look at the matter simply from the point of view of the wage-earner the action of the tramwaymen is blundering and shortsighted in the highest degree. It is converting people everywhere to the idea of compulsory service. This futile dissipation of national energy must be prevented. If commonsense and loyalty cannot do it, as many of us have always hoped and desired, then there must be some form of national organisation and compulsion for the purpose. We shall not be surprised if some scheme of the kind is put into operation shortly in areas engaged upon Government work. If so, in view of many facts that have come to light recently, can any of us, in spite of our traditions of industrial freedom, venture to resist it?

* * *

WE have received this week a letter from one of our readers of German blood, long resident in England, expressing his loyalty and his deep abhorrence of German methods in this war. We have not printed it, partly because it would be the precursor of many more, but chiefly because it is so unnecessary. A naturalised citizen is a full citizen, and we are reluctant even to appear to insult our fine traditions of freedom and equality before the law by suggesting to our friends that they should make a public profession that they are all honourable men. For purposes of business, where prejudice is often rampant and unreasonable, such action may be useful; but for religious fellowship and intercourse on all the higher interests of life it is quite unnecessary, unless our friends, not by their names but by their actions, show themselves unworthy of our trust.

THE BAPTISM OF FIRE.

It was as fire that the Spirit came on the day of Pentecost, and it is as fire that it must move in our hearts to-day. Our partiality in recent times for the gentler aspects of the Gospel has obscured its sterner qualities, and tended to concentrate attention upon a few selected passages about love and peace. In the day of storm our religion must suffer loss unless it can recover its severity. The vision of judgment is as needful as entrancing dreams of the kingdom. Jesus Christ is not the Master of a small company of unoffending pacifists, but of men who have accepted the yoke of discipline and learned to endure hardness, and shrink not from blending the rigour of judgment with the promise of peace.

And so the Spirit came at first, not simply as balm for aching hearts or tranquil rest for storm-tossed lives, but as fire, fire which is the symbol of cleansing, of fusion, and of sacrifice. It is in this way that we pray that it may come upon us and our whole people now. This is the pentecostal gift we crave, for nothing else can save us from the faults which still cripple us, and arm us with conquering strength. We still suffer, in this hour of supreme danger, from the weakness of divided counsels, from various forms of individual and class selfishness, from a deeper concern with our own interests than with the common good. Until these things are purged away by a consuming purpose, a sense that at this critical moment of our history God needs us for one thing, and for one thing only, many of our good intentions will remain ineffective. While Parliament is handcuffed by hostile interests when it tries to check the national menace of drink; while different trades clamour for more money without any regard to the country's need of cohesion and united effort; while many of us still play the role of obstinate advocates of our own opinions without any chastening sense of the need of a common front in presence of a common foe; must we not confess that we need the cleansing fire to purge away the dross of our selfishness, our careless absorption in matters of minor importance, our weakening anxieties about money or comfort, and to fuse us into one body, controlled by one spirit and dedicated to one purpose, as men who have learned to live a disciplined life in obedience to the will of God?

And this baptism of fire when it has done its work in our hearts will make us capable of sacrifice without limits. The question will no longer be how much can we keep for ourselves, but how much can we give for the good of all. Many of the things which we value greatly in ordinary days will begin to appear insignificant. To men who are called to high spiritual service, and are ready to give themselves to the uttermost, the ordinary motives of prudence and anxiety have lost their power of appeal. Sacrifice of this kind is not the result of arranging terms or striking a bargain, it is an act of instinctive obedience to an impulse of love and goodness which is lifting the common life all around us to a higher level. It is done with a fine recklessness of the consequences, simply because it is the true and holy thing to do at the moment, and the Spirit of God working within has swept us out of the prison-house of self into the onward rush of purposes greater than our own.

It may well be doubted whether this transformation of a whole people, from being the victim of its own rivalries and divisions till it becomes conscious of only one spirit and one aim, can be effected by anything but religion. It may be roused by common dangers or sobered by common fears; but the vision of a common duty and the power to sacrifice everything in doing it, these are things which, in the strength of their appeal to masses of men and their transfiguring influence over individual character, can only be called religious. We need at the present time to mobilise the spiritual forces of the country if its material tasks are to be properly performed. All rivalries and divisions must be laid aside, that with one heart and one voice we may call men to the life of obedience and sacrifice and joyful service of the common cause. The pentecostal gift for which all the churches in the land should pray is this baptism of fire, that they may be able to kindle the sense of union and resolve among all classes of our people, wherever the waverers are still to be found, or selfish purposes prevail over the public good. If they do not throw all their energies into helping men to trust in God and do their duty to-day and tomorrow, it is vain for them to prophesy about the future or to indulge in dreams of distant peace.

It is here, too, that we may look for some fresh and deep revealing of God in our midst. If, as we pass through the fire, much of our selfishness and indifference drops away; if men of different opinions and parties agree to act cordially together because they have learned the sacredness of common affections and the value of common aims; if our absorption in money and industrial success gives place to the nobility of duty and reverence for the life laid down in sacrifice; if through the clouds of warfare there shines upon us a new vision of righteousness, and we learn as a people to prefer the honour of our country to its safety; if even some dim sense is born within us of the sacredness of sorrow and the meaning of the travail of our souls as an offering for the world's need of deliverance; we may still be far from the kingdom of God, but we shall have a clearer vision of its meaning and a stronger power of dedicating ourselves to its service than we have ever possessed before. It will no longer seem strange to apply as a parable to our own lives this story of the first disciples in the hour of their despondency and fear, how the Holy Spirit came down upon them as the rushing wind and in tongues of fire, making them of one heart and one mind, and sending them forth ready to endure all things for the sake of their cause, and for the glory of God.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

GOD hath not given us the spirit of fear; but of power, and of love, and of a sound mind. 2 TIMOTHY I. 7.

THE Lord will draw us and securely lead us to himself, in a way contrary to all our natural will, until he have divested us thereof, and consumed it, and made it thoroughly subject unto the Divine Will. For this is his will: that we should cease to regard our own wishes or dislikes; that it should become a light matter to us whether he give or take away, whether we have abundance or suffer want, and let all things go; if only we may receive and apprehend God himself; that whether things please or displease us, we may leave all things to take their course, and cleave to him alone. Then first do we attain to the fulness of God's love as his children, when it is no longer happiness or misery, prosperity or adversity, that draws us to him, or keeps us back from him. What we should then experience none can utter; but it would be something far better than when we were burning with the first flame of love, and had great emotion but less true submission; for here, though there may be less show of zeal, and less vehemence of feeling, there is more true faithfulness to God. That we may attain thereto, may God help us with his grace. AMEN.

JOHN TAULER.

NOT IN VAIN.

SAY not the struggle nought availeth,
The labour and the wounds are vain,
The enemy faints not, nor faileth,
And as things have been they remain.

If hopes were dupes, fears may be liars;
It may be, in yon smoke concealed,
Your comrades chase e'en now the fliers,
And, but for you, possess the field.

For while the tired waves, vainly breaking,
Seem here no painful inch to gain,
Far back, through creeks and inlets making,
Comes silent, flooding in, the main.

And not by Eastern windows only,
When daylight comes, comes in the light;
In front the sun climbs slow, how slowly,
But Westward, look, the land is bright!

ARTHUR HUGH CLOUGH.

GRANT thy servants, O God, to be set on fire with thy spirit, strengthened by thy power, illuminated by thy splendour, filled with thy grace, and go forward by thine aid. Give them, O Lord, a right faith, perfect love, true humility. Grant, O Lord, that there may be in us simple affection, brave patience, persevering obedience, perpetual peace, a pure mind, a right and clean heart, a good will, a holy conscience, spiritual compunction, ghostly strength, a life unspotted and unblameable; and after having manfully finished our course, may we be enabled happily to enter into thy kingdom. AMEN.

RETALIATION.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—We have been shocked at reading of the attacks on peaceful citizens, in London and elsewhere, whose only fault has been that they have German names.

Perhaps we cannot be altogether surprised that uneducated people should be so carried away by indignation at the unscrupulous methods of the Germans as to resort to unscrupulous methods in return. But what does surprise me is that people of education and refinement should so far lose their heads that, while condemning the German poisonings as cruel, barbarous, and un-English, they should, in the same breath, say, "Let us follow their example, let us be cruel and barbarous too." When English colonists had to contend with North American Indians, they did not imitate them in scalping and torturing their prisoners. If they did not, like the Quakers, avoid war altogether, they, at least, carried it on under civilised conditions. A letter appeared from Mr. Nevinson in The Manchester Guardian of the 10th inst., and was followed on the 13th by one from "Artifex," strongly protesting against such imitation of the German barbarous methods. And I am glad to find, in a letter from the Archbishop of Canterbury to the Premier, published in to-day's papers, the following passage:—"The day will come when the German people will look back on these iniquities with the same detestation with which we now regard them. Meantime, the wrath with which these things have inflamed our people seeks utterance in action....either in the senseless outbreaks which have disgraced some of our streets....or in a desire to retaliate, as in the case of noxious gases, by ourselves using the same weapons. Earnestly do I trust that we shall never be induced or driven to a course which would lower us towards the level which we denounce."

About ten days ago Mr. Asquith said, in answer to a question, that those were not the methods pursued by the English Government; yet a few days later it appears that he, too, is swept away by the wave of indignation, and refuses to allow the question to be discussed in the House before measures of reprisal are adopted. I think the Christian churches ought immediately to unite in a strong protest against following an evil example, and stooping to such barbarous methods as the use of poisonous gas. Such a protest might be welcomed by Mr. Asquith as recalling him to the high principles which he has usually set before him; and even if it should prove ineffectual, I think we owe it to ourselves, in the name of our Christian profession, to make our voice heard, and to show that, if we cannot command a majority, there is, at least, as in the days of Elijah, a large minority who have not bowed the knee to Baal. Cannot we get up, in the churches of all denominations, petitions to Mr. Asquith against the use of poisonous gas?—Yours, &c.

M. C. MARTINEAU.

Alington Lane, Leitchworth.

May 17, 1915.

To the Editor of THE INQUIRER.

SIR,—At the beginning of the war a friend said to me "The real danger is that we should vanquish the German armies and be vanquished by the Prussian spirit." That danger is now upon us. In Monday's Times there was a letter from the Archbishop of Canterbury denouncing the use of poisonous gases by the enemy as "infamous" and adding "most earnestly do I trust that we shall never anywhere be induced or driven to a course which would lower us towards the level of those whom we denounce." In to-day's Times Lord Kitchener is reported as denouncing the same practice as "diabolical" and declaring that the Allies have determined to retaliate. The Primate stands for the principle that the value of a victory of the Allies will depend upon the means used to gain it. Lord Kitchener stands (so far as this utterance and declaration go) for the principle that "military necessity" justifies the use of "diabolical" means. Under which flag shall we range ourselves? God grant that the Archbishop of Canterbury may stand firm. If he does we shall have a Primate indeed.—Yours, &c.,

PHILIP H. WICKSTEED.

Childrey, near Wantage.

May 19, 1915.

[We deal with the argument of these letters in our 'Notes of the Week.' Mr Wicksteed overlooks the fact that the "Prussian spirit" consisted in using a formidable and devastating weapon in spite of a solemn compact not to do so, and against men who were in consequence quite unprepared to meet it.—ED. OF INQUIRER.]

THE GOLDEN BOUGH. By J. G. Frazer. Vol. XII. Bibliography and General Index. London: Macmillan & Co., 20s. net.

THIS volume puts the coping stone upon a great achievement in which science and literature have joined hands in mutual harmony. Sir James Frazer's original scheme has grown amazingly under his hand; but the new material has all been digested and subordinated to the plan in his own mind, and his instinct for literary art has never failed him. The index and bibliography reveal the extent of his own labours, and make the task of reference easy for other students. 'The Golden Bough' is in itself, a library of materials in magic, folk-lore, and primitive religions; and from this point of view would be almost useless without an excellent index. Fortunately, this need has been supplied on a most lavish scale, and henceforth this volume must stand on the same shelf as the best books of reference. For instance, the reader can now put his hand at once upon the various passages in which the author refers to Christianity, or discusses the various customs associated with Christmas, Easter, and Whitsuntide. In his Preface, Sir James Frazer pays a cordial tribute of gratitude to his publishers, Messrs. Macmillan & Co., and his printers, Messrs. R. & R. Clark, for their courtesy and patience in helping him to bring to completion one of the greatest literary undertakings of recent years. We cannot resist the pleasure of quoting the following words:—"Publishers and printers can do much to help or hinder an author's work. Mine have done everything that could be done to render my labours as light and as pleasant as possible. I thank them sincerely and gratefully for their help, and I reflect with pleasure on the relations of unbroken cordiality which have existed between us for more than a quarter of a century."

In a slow and stately procession the volumes of the International Critical Commentary issue from the press. The latest is the SECOND EPISTLE OF ST. PAUL TO THE CORINTHIANS, edited by the Rev. A. Plummer (T. & T. Clark, 12s.). It is on the same scale as its companions, with a wealth of critical and exegetical notes, and makes its appeal chiefly to the scholar. It is open to doubt whether the traditional method of minute verbal discussion is the best way of illuminating the greatest religious literature of antiquity for the modern mind. We ourselves look forward to the time when we shall demand from the interpreter of the New Testament not only high and exact scholarship, but also religious imagination and fine literary taste. So long, however, as our theological schools confine their attention chiefly to the niceties of language, commentaries of the traditional pattern will continue to be written and to find a few patient readers. From this point of view this volume, and the series to which it belongs, are worthy of all admiration, for they are quite the best of their kind.

We have received a copy of the second edition of A BOOK OF DAILY STRENGTH, edited by the Rev. V. D. Davis (London, at the Lindsey Press, 3s. 6d. net). It has been enriched by the addition of a number of prayers, which will make the book more suitable for family devotion. Its drawback for general use is the narrow range from which the readings have been taken, for they are all by Unitarian writers in England or America. We need scarcely mention here that they have in them the fine flavour of Christian piety. For those who are inclined to think that Unitarian theology is inconsistent with warmth of devotional feeling or clearness of spiritual insight, there could be no better cure than an hour or two spent with this volume. But we have a feeling of confinement in any attempt to nourish the soul's deepest life in enclosed pastures. Theology divides but affection unites, and the book of devotion which we desire to make our daily companion must be as human as the Bible and as catholic as the love of Christ.

A NEW edition of a 'HANDBOOK FOR MINISTERS OF RELIGION,' edited by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie has been published by the Lindsey Press. The original edition appeared in 1900, and in its new form many additions and alterations have been introduced. It contains forms of service for Baptism, Marriage, and the Burial of the Dead, and for other special occasions. The editor has drawn his materials from various sources, but particularly from the Minister's Handbook issued by the American Unitarian Association.

MESSRS. WILLIAMS & NORGATE have published in a cheap form two of Dr. John Hunter's volumes of sermons, 'DE PROFUNDIS CLAMAVI' and 'GOD AND LIFE' (2s. net each vol.). They contain some of the ripest and richest fruit of his teaching. Many friends will be glad to possess them for quiet hours and the quickening of inward strength in perilous times.

THE sixth and last volume of MACAULAY'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND WITH ILLUSTRATIONS, edited by Prof. C. H. Firth, has appeared with commendable punctuality in spite of the disturbance of the war. We can give it no higher praise than to say that it is equal to its predecessors. Macaulay's 'History' is something more than a splendid Whig manifesto, it is one of the classics in the noble historical literature of our country, and should help to fan the flame of patriotism at the present time as we realise afresh in its pages the sacred ideals which lie at the heart of our civilisation and the cost of our struggles for freedom in the past. The index, which occupies more than 100 pages, is entirely new, and has been prepared under the supervision of the editor.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

CUCKOO!

Summer is icumen in,
Loud sing cuckoo!

So says the oldest of all English country songs. In Norfolk they say:—

In April the cuckoo shows his bill;
In May he sings both night and day;
In June he altereth his tune;
In July he prepares to fly;
In August go he must.

To which the Suffolk people add:—

In September you'll ollers remember;
In October you'll never get over.

For a September cuckoo cry is a thing to be remembered; while the fugitive bird that has delayed its flight until October may never succeed in crossing the sea. That, at any rate, would be a young bird, for the parents are wont to leave our shores a month before their offspring, having no concern for them after the egg is laid. How these learn the route by which to follow their elders to the far south, even to Natal and the Cape, is, indeed, a mystery, one of not a few mysteries which invest the "wandering voice" which heralds the summer.

So welcome a guest is the cuckoo—for does it not pick up the mud and bring back the flowers?—that in Shropshire it used to be the custom on first hearing its note for the farmer's men to leave work at noon and spend the rest of the day in mirth and jollity over the "cuckoo ale." The bird was not to be blamed if some rustic heads got fuddled or broken.

In Germany they maintain that the right thing to do on hearing the cuckoo for the first time is to roll on the grass—the more the better—this exercise being considered a safeguard against lumbago.

To the men of Gotham the cuckoo is "she"; but it is the male whose call we hear, the female uttering a much less striking, bubbling note. The cuckoo hires a nest instead of doing any house-building of her own like other birds, but she pays no rent. The next irregularity is that Mistress Cuckoo lays her egg upon the ground, then picking it up in her capacious bill, looks round for a suitable nest in which to deposit it. The snug nest of a chaffinch or hedge-sparrow is often chosen. In the marshes the reed-warbler's ingenious home is occupied, and out on the downs the tit-lark or meadow-pipit is victimised, and many others' are also brought into its service. Now cuckoo's eggs vary a good deal in colour, some think so as to bear a resemblance to the eggs of the owner of the nest. Another characteristic of the egg is its small size, for while the cuckoo is quite a big bird, its egg does not look out of place in the nest of a lark. Here is a stroke of genius, for a large egg would be awkward to carry in the mouth, and a little bird could not sit on a big egg so as to keep it warm, and might be suspicious of a trick being played, and turn it out. Moreover, little eggs hatch out more quickly than big ones, and that is an advantage as the risks to life are lessened. A swan has to brood its eggs for six weeks, while the cuckoo needs only fourteen days. When the young cuckoo, a veritable little ruffian, is hatched he proceeds, before he can even see, by wriggling and kicking, to eject all the landlady's precious eggs or children. In fact, if, as is sometimes the case, there be two brother or sister cuckoos hatched in one nest, a struggle ensues which ends only when one is hoisted overboard. "Birds in their little nests agree," says the poet, but he forgot the cuckoo. Of what use, indeed, would it be for the parent to set up house on her own account when her offspring are endowed with such tempestuous tempers that two of them cannot live in peace together? But if the fledgling's temper is bad its appetite is good—very good. Monopolising all her industry, this imp fairly exhausts the strength of its little foster mother to bring it sufficient animal or insect food, and other than that it will not touch. Is it to be wondered at that in a few weeks it is stout and strong enough to take its flight to Africa?

Another cuckoo riddle: How many eggs, in how many nests, will one hen-cuckoo lay? And again, when two cuckoo's eggs are found in one nest, were they laid by one or by two birds? Nobody has yet discovered.

The cuckoo has a garden all its own. To this strange bird, indeed, spade work is as foreign as house-building or nursing. It plants its flowers, like its eggs, wheresoever it will. We find them all about the meadows and hedge-banks. Lady's Smock and Ragged Robin are both cuckoo flowers, and so is the wild arum, or "Lords and Ladies," which goes by the name of cuckoo-pint. What does this mean—the cuckoo's pint-cup? or does it carry us back to the men of Gotham and the Pent Cuckoo? For may not the staff in the centre stand for the bird, while the green trumpet is the hedge that pens it in?

The cuckoo never dies—an old country notion—but turns into a hawk before the winter, recovering its proper self when spring returns. Truly, while the cuckoo disappears, the hawks remain in the woods, and the cuckoo's barred plumage gives countenance to the hawk theory. But, unlike the hawk, it is friendly with small birds which may often be seen in its company, flying behind it from hedge to tree, and possibly picking up the crumbs from this rich man's table.

Strange, fascinating creature, greedy but useful, tyrannous yet lovable, so baffling to understand! Indeed, almost

No Bird: but an invisible thing,
A voice, a mystery.

MEMORIAL NOTICES.

CAPT. L. SHAW FARQUHARSON.

We deeply regret to record that Capt. L. Shaw Farquharson, only son of the Rev. Alexander Farquharson, was killed in action near Ypres on the 12th inst. He was educated at Charterhouse before proceeding to Sandhurst. At school and college he took many prizes, and he represented them both at cricket and football. On leaving Charterhouse his master put it on record that he had no doubt "Farquharson's strong, modest, and lovable personality will carry him far in the coming days." He was gazetted to the Royal Scots Regiment as second-lieutenant in October, 1903. In India he served as Station Staff-Officer at Kamptee, as A.D.C. to General Keir at Allahabad, and then as adjutant of the 1st Battalion. When war was declared, several applications were made to the War Office for his services, but he wished to go to the front with his own regiment. In France he saw much fighting, and had different narrow escapes. The day before he was killed, when the British line had been broken, on his own initiative he led forward his men, drove back the enemy, and re-occupied the lost ground. By his promptness and gallantry he thus saved a very difficult situation. For this action he received the special thanks of his Commanding Officer, and General Allanby sent his congratulations to the 1st Royal Scots for what he described as "a splendid and successful counter-attack." Unfortunately, he could not then be reinforced or relieved, and he was ordered to hold on to the position at all costs. He did so, and the ground was permanently retained by his company. Early next morning, the 12th inst., while the others rested, he was superintending further protections for the shattered trench, when he was shot through the head and instantly killed. Col. Callender writes how the whole regiment mourns his loss, and that Capt. Farquharson was, in every respect, one of the best of the younger officers in the army, and the most sterling good fellow he had ever met. A letter written by him five days before his death, to be delivered unopened to his parents if he were killed, said: "I hope I shall have done my duty to the best of my ability.... Fondest love, and don't mourn too much for me. Try rather to think that you are honoured in giving a dear one for your country and for liberty." So passed on a brave soldier and a good man. With two brother officers his body was laid to rest in the little churchyard of Vlainertinghe, about one and a half miles from Ypres on the Poperinghe road.

THE LATE MR. WALTER HOLLAND.

As briefly announced in our issue last week the funeral of the late Mr. Walter Holland, of Liverpool, took place on Wednesday the 12th inst. Before the interment at the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, a service was held in Ullet Road Church. There was a large attendance representative of the business, civic, and philanthropic life of Liverpool. The service was conducted by the Rev. J. Collins Odgers. In the course of a short address he paid the following tribute to Mr. Holland's memory:—"I do not attempt on this occasion to speak of the public life, the business career, of him whom we have lost, nor of those good qualities which distinguished him in the world of commerce; I will only say in this connection that it was his great ability, his practical knowledge, his wide and varied experience, that characterised his career; wherever he went his advice was sought for. He had the satisfaction, as years went on, of seeing his efforts crowned by the success they merited. It becomes me here to speak rather of the graces of his character, of his sympathy with everything that had a sorrow in it, his glad co-operation in every movement that had for its object the amelioration of the lot of the struggling masses of society. No one could attend the Annual Meetings of our Domestic Mission in Mill Street without feeling how tender was his heart, how warm his sympathy with those whose part it is to pass through life with so little to bless and cheer them. In most of the philanthropic institutions of this city he took the deepest interest. Not only did he most generously support them, but gave to them the benefit of his wise counsel, his wide experience, and the benediction of a loving heart. He knew how necessary it is to combine wisdom with love, knowledge with sympathy, in all philanthropic effort. And I believe that his love of mankind was concomitant with his love of God, and that these two great Christian commandments were the basis of his religion. No theological boundaries were permitted to limit the range of his wide sympathies. In his presence the hearts of all men opened like the flowers to the sunshine, for all felt the power of his genial personality, his pleasant companionship, his kindly fellow-feeling."

NATIONAL CONFERENCE UNION FOR SOCIAL SERVICE.

NINTH ANNUAL MEETING.

THE Ninth Annual Business Meeting of the Union was, owing to the postponement of the Triennial Conference, held on the afternoon of the 26th ult. at the High Pavement Chapel Schools, Nottingham, by kind invitation of the Council of the Chapel. Certain proposals of the retiring executive regarding changes in the name and object and constitution of the Union, outlined in a previous issue of this paper, stirred up a considerable correspondence by post and induced a number of specially eager members to take considerable journeys in order to be present at the Meeting—including the Rev. F. H. Jones and Miss Leigh Browne (London), Rev. H. D. Roberts and Miss H. M. Johnson (Liverpool), Miss Lucy Brooks (Manchester), and Miss Catherine Gittins and Miss Clephan (Leicester). Among the Nottingham members present were Mr. Ernest A. Smith and the Rev. J. C. Ballantyne. Mr. Ballantyne, in the absence of the President through illness, was in the chair.

The Secretary, the Rev. H. H. Johnson, submitted the Annual Report, which, together with the Hon. Treasurer's Report, was adopted.

The Report stated that the Union had been well represented in June last at the third Interdenominational Summer School at Swanwick, in the inauguration of which it had played a prominent part. Thirty-eight members of the Union were present, a number equal to that of the Society of Friends and second only to that of the Church of England. In July, Miss Catherine Gittins, who had held the Secretaryship from the foundation of the Union in 1906, resigned and the Rev. H. H. Johnson was appointed Secretary. Work under the new Secretaryship had only just begun when the war broke out, and plans already outlined were at once rendered nugatory, the only piece of work originally projected and carried through being the publication of a four-paged leaflet—'The National Conference Union for Social Service: What is it?'—which has proved very useful. The Union adapted itself as best it could to meet the national crisis. It first issued a two-paged leaflet—'The War, Social Reform and the Church's Opportunity'—in which it emphasised the need of all future social reform being inspired by a religious and Christian spirit. It followed this up by the publication of a 'Course,' for the use of study-circles, etc., on 'European International Polity'—"with special reference to the origins and issues of the present war, and to the fundamental religious principles involved in securing a just and lasting peace." Associated with the 'Course' was a carefully compiled bibliography, with references to existing organisations and to the most reliable and accessible sources of information. Some 1,500 copies of the 'Course' were circulated among our Churches and among members of the Union. The 'Course' had not been taken up nearly so widely and systematically as had been hoped, but a number of our Churches had carried through series of lectures dealing with such questions as the 'Course' raised, notably the High Pavement Chapel, Nottingham; Hope Street Church, Liverpool; the New Gravel Pit Church, Hackney; and the St. Helen's Free Church. The seven lectures at Nottingham were followed by audiences averaging from 150 to 200, while the attendances at the six lectures at Liverpool averaged over 100. The Report expressed the hope that the 'Course' might be taken up by our Churches far more widely and thoroughly throughout the next autumn and winter sessions. The Interdenominational Conference Committee of the Social Service Unions was recommending the 'Course' in its selected list of literature for study preparatory to the forthcoming Summer School at Swanwick, June 26–July 5, when the subject under discussion would be "International Relationship in the Light of Christianity." The Report also stated that a further 'Course' of twelve weekly lessons on the war, specially designed for use in Sunday Schools, was running through the April, May and June issues of The Sunday School Monthly, to be concluded on the eve of the Swanwick Summer School. The Report further announced the publication on April 1 of the first number of The Social Service Quarterly, which the Committee trust will greatly help to knit the members together into a strong and vital organisation.

The Report concluded:—“Before closing the Report some reference must be made to the financial situation. Such a record of work as this Report offers was rendered possible owing to the generosity of one of the members. This generosity cannot continue. No appeal for funds had been made during the year until that which appeared in the April Quarterly (an appeal for £150 for the year dating from that issue). As a response to this, one promise of £10 and two of £5 have been made. It is proposed now to make a general appeal, and the Committee have confidence that the £150 required for the coming year's expenditure will be forthcoming. And if so small a sum, from such a wealthy community as ours, is not forthcoming, they will then be justified in arriving at the conclusion that the Union is, in the opinion of that community, not worth maintaining. They believe, however, that a perusal of this Report and of the April Quarterly will lead to another conclusion.”

After lengthy and animated discussion at the Business Meeting, it was decided not to make, at any rate for the present, any radical changes in the Constitution; or as regards the name and object of the Union. But it was resolved that since the Constitution does now need considerable amendment, the question of its further amendment should be referred back to the Committee, and that their further recommendations be laid before the next Annual Meeting.

The resignations of the President, the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, for reasons of health; and of the Hon. Treasurer, Mr. C. Weiss, were accepted with regret and with hearty thanks for their past services. Miss Catherine Gittins and the Rev. F. H. Jones, were unanimously elected President and Hon. Treasurer respectively, and have consented to undertake these offices.

The following were appointed an Executive Committee, together with the President, Treasurer and Secretary:—Rev. J. C. Ballantyne, Miss Lucy Brooks, Mr. T. M. Chalmers, Miss Clephan, Miss H. M. Johnson, Mr. E. A. Smith, and the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas.

LONDON DISTRICT UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE Annual Meeting of the London District Unitarian Society was held at Essex Hall on Wednesday, May 19, Mr. A. Savage Cooper in the chair. The Report was presented by the Hon. Secretary, Mr. Ronald Bartram, and the financial statement by the Hon. Treasurer, Mr. T. B. Taylor. In regard to the latter it is inevitable that the expenditure during the coming year should be heavier than usual owing to the special aid which the Society will have to render to many churches in consequence of the war, and the Council, therefore, urgently appeal for increased support.

The Rev. J. A. Pearson, Missionary Minister, in presenting his report, spoke with characteristic hopefulness and enthusiasm of the work which is being carried on in the London area. The numbers of the congregations had, of course, been greatly diminished in consequence of the war, but it was a matter for pride that so many young men trained in their schools had proved faithful to the high ideals set before them, and had responded to the call of their country to fight for liberty, truth, and honour. Their needs, at the present time, were great, but so were their opportunities, for in common with other churches they had to play their part in the making of a new England after the war. It must not be forgotten that a good deal of their work had to be done in districts that were no whit better than those in which the Domestic Missions were operating, and a Minister's Purse had been started for the purpose of helping individual cases of urgent need to which contributions would be very welcome.

The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the Reports, referred to the work of the Society in detail, and to the losses which had been sustained during the year through the death of several old and valued supporters. He did not think the present conflict showed that the work of such societies as theirs had failed, for they were, at least, as a nation, trying to conduct the war on something like humane principles, and in accordance with those ideals of unselfishness and helpfulness to those labouring under sorrow and oppression which they had been taught to follow. A resolution of sympathy with Mr. and Mrs. Farquharson on the death of their son, Capt. Shaw Farquharson, in action, was passed, all standing.

Mr. Classon Drummond, who seconded the adoption of the reports, dealt with the probable state of things after the war, and the effect it was likely to have on the national character. At the present moment the country, speaking broadly, was stirred by a deep and intense passion, not only of patriotism, which had enabled us to find ourselves as a nation, and to act as defenders of the weak and oppressed. Men of every class were shedding their blood for this noble ideal on the battlefield, and at home, among those who could not sacrifice themselves in this way, there was a strong undercurrent of intense feeling and resolution to back up the efforts of those who were fighting, and to cleanse and purify the national life. This was particularly noticeable among the women, who had found ways of serving their country which some of them had never dreamt of attempting before. But amidst the lurid glow of war were they thinking, not only of what was to be done with Germany after the war, what was to become of Belgium or Serbia, but of what was to happen to us here in England? Did they realise that the economic sacrifices of the present time, however severe they might be, were going to continue, and that probably for the rest of the lives of all those present it would be impossible to maintain the standard of living at which they had previously aimed? Were they able to face that prospect cheerfully for the sake of the country? Again, had they thought of the stream of maimed and broken men who would come back to them after the war, and made up their minds to look after them as they ought to be looked after? Had they thought of the widows and orphans, and were they prepared to take them to their heart, to nourish and succour them, and not leave them to knock at the door of the Poor Law? The man at the front is learning to know his brother man, and officer and ranker alike were making sacrifices for each other; but were they to return to the cold individualism of our industrial system, or was some way to be found by which a higher ideal could be put before the nation, an ideal of endeavour first for country, and then for self? If they were not to drift again into the apathy which had so often degraded their nation, surely one of the first duties of their group of churches, as of all churches, was to hold up a vision of what might be before men, showing them the dangers into which they can so easily slip, and the responsibilities they ought to assume. The whole character of the country was at the present time in a state of flux, but it rested with the churches to take a strong line and to point out the way for others to follow. The layman looked to the churches to give him a lead, and surely, if what he had said of the probabilities of the future were true, they needed a more complete realisation of the spirit of love and Christian charity which they had been taught to believe in from childhood, and which opened up to them a new way of life and of social endeavour, as well as a new economics. If they took the opportunities before them now, and made efforts to train the national character before it is actually faced with the problems that must come after the war, he believed that out of the stress and strain of the present time a greater and a nobler England would arise than they had ever known.

An interesting and sympathetic account of the work which is being done in connection with the churches at Forest Gate, Walthamstow, and Stratford, was given by Sister Seymour, who described the activities of an average week in which she and Sister Knight were engaged. Working together as they did, they felt that the opportunity thus afforded them of coming into touch with the lives of the people, and giving them—not indiscriminate charity, but nobler ideals, removing here and there some cloud of error or misconception, and releasing their minds from the tyranny of oppressive doctrines which filled them with fear, was one for which they could not be sufficiently thankful. More and more they realised the great need of the liberal faith, and the necessity for their work of saving souls, however small the outward results might appear.

Mr. E. A. Carlier traced the development of the movement at Deptford in a highly optimistic vein. The enterprise and independence of the workers there have achieved wonders in spite of difficulties which would have daunted many ardent workers, and if the chief need of the moment—a new building, the old one having been condemned by the London County Council—is met, there is every prospect of a flourishing church growing up in this crowded district.

Mr. J. W. Peterken also reported favourably on the work at Leytonstone.

and cordially alluded to the warm sympathy and support which Mr. Pearson continually gives to the churches he supervises.

The Chairman moved the election of the officers and committee for the ensuing year, announcing that Dr. Herbert Smith had consented to act as President. The resolution was seconded by Mr. Wilson, and carried. Dr. Herbert Smith, in reply, expressed his great appreciation of the work the Society was doing and his desire to serve its interests to the best of his ability.

ANNIVERSARY MEETINGS.

THE REV. W. C. BOWIE writes:—

"May I announce that all ministers who intimated their intention of being present at the Anniversary Meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in Whit-week have now had tickets forwarded to them for the luncheon following the Conference on Thursday morning, and for the Conversazione at Essex Hall on Thursday evening. Hospitality has been provided for ministers of country congregations who sent notice by the time stated on the circular, and they have been informed of the name and address of their hosts. Delegates of District Societies and Congregations whose names had reached the office have also had their tickets forwarded. If any one has been overlooked, I shall be glad to be informed at once.

"In connection with the Religious Service at Essex Church, Kensington, on Tuesday evening, May 25, I am desired by Mr. Ronald P. Jones, the Hon. Secretary of the Congregation to say that Lindsey Hall (opposite the Church) will be open for rest and conversation at 7 P.M., and for an hour after the close of the Service. Ministers and Delegates may like to see this beautiful hall, and to make use of it for meeting their hosts and friends."

NEWS OF THE CHURCHES.

Huddersfield.—The Rev. Robert A. Dickson, late of Cores End Congregational Church, Bucks., has been recognised as pastor of Fitzwilliam Street Church, Huddersfield. Mr. Owen Balmforth, J.P. (ex-Mayor of Huddersfield), presided, and the Revs. E. Thackray (Stand), R. Nicol Cross (Leeds), J. W. Hickson (Sheffield), brother of the minister, D. C. Tincker (Huddersfield), W. R. Shanks (Holbeck), M. Evans (Lydgate), T. Paxton (Bradford), F. Coleman (Hunslet), Messrs. R. H. Cleal and H. Barrett, were present. Letters of commendation were read from the Revs. John Hunter (London), A. H. Moncur Sime (Shrewsbury), A. T. Hogg (Dewsbury), J. G. Dufty (Huddersfield), T. F. Lewis and G. C. Dalglish (Maidenhead), Alderman Sir John Thomas, J.P., C.C., and others. The Rev. Robert A. Dickson, in acknowledging the very cordial welcome extended to himself and Mrs. Dickson, said that every Christian should endeavour to keep constantly in mind the original and fundamental purpose of the great Christian movement in history. That purpose was to transform human society into the Kingdom of God by regenerating all human relations and reconstituting them in accordance with the will of God. The task is that of changing the world-as-it-is into the world-as-it-ought-to-be. There is a growing impatience with religion that is merely academic, and it is becoming increasingly doubtful whether the average congregation is willing, or even amid the strain and stress of our modern life, qualified, to follow the minister in his excursions to either the giddiest heights of theological speculation, the uttermost depths of philosophical investigation, or round the whole circle of the sciences. His own people were not the vilest sinners upon earth, neither were they quite ready for translation; they consisted in the main of men and women who, amid the rush and turmoil of life, carried some music in their hearts—he would strive to set it singing. If he understood rightly the work of the Christian minister, it is not that of answering all the theological questions and conundrums of the age, or of adjusting theological differences, or of teaching certain views about a theological God: it is rather that of persuading the people to display the divineness of love in simple tasks and homely duties.

London: Limehouse.—The thirtieth annual report of the Durning Hall Institute gives an encouraging account of the various activities carried on under the direction of the Rev. J. S. Toye. Forty-four past and present scholars and teachers have responded to their country's call, and their names are printed in the Roll of Honour. Mr. Toye comments on the work of the past twelve months, and gives it as his opinion that after twenty-five years in which he has had his share both of encouragement and disappointment, he finds a very large balance on the encouragement side. This year exceptional difficulties and many losses have, of course, had to be faced, but the attendances at the chapel on Sunday evenings continues good, and most of the evening meetings have done well, though the musical efficiency has suffered. The new and handsome room given for the use of the Girls' Club by Miss Durning-Lawrence has proved a great attraction, and there are now thirty-five names on the books. Happy evenings are spent making garments for Belgian refugees, the soldiers, &c., and Miss Durning-Lawrence's talks and readings are a source of great pleasure. The Post Office Bank has done well, and also the Provident Association. They are both larger than ever.

Manchester: Lower Mosley Street Schools.—On Friday evening the 14th inst. an interesting gathering took place in the Club Drawing Room, to do honour to Mr. Henry Hyde. Some time ago a meeting was held, and a committee formed of members of the school and other admirers of Mr. Hyde's life's work. The committee decided to raise a sum of money to be presented to Mr. Hyde. The response to their appeal has been considered satisfactory. Mr. A. Ernest Steintal was in the chair, and Mr. J. H. Reynolds made the presentation, which took the form of a cheque for £106 19s. 6d. Mr. J. H. Faraday, an old pupil of Mr. Hyde, the Rev. E. L. H. Thomas, Mr. R. Glazier, and Miss Herford having spoken, Mr. Hyde made a suitable reply.

Mottram.—The anniversary sermons in connection with the Christian Church Sunday School were preached on Sunday afternoon and evening, May 9th, by the Rev. John Evans of Rochdale. The collections, which were larger than usual, amounted to £20 13s. 8d.

Plymouth.—On Wednesday, May 12, the Treville Street Unitarian Chapel was reopened after thorough renovation of the interior. The existing chapel was opened on May 13, 1832, when the preachers were the Rev. Henry Acton of Exeter and the Rev. W. J. Odgers, who was shortly afterwards appointed minister of the church and served it faithfully for over twenty years. The older "meeting house" stood on the same site. The preacher on Wednesday was Dr. J. Edwin Odgers, son of the Rev. W. J. Odgers. A public meeting was held in the evening, presided over by the Rev. W. H. Burgess, at which addresses were given by the Rev. A. E. O'Connor, who brought the greetings of the Western Union of Unitarian Churches, Mr. A. G. Ellis, Chairman of the congregation, the Rev. Hatty Baker, lady-minister of the "Plymouth Conference," and Dr. Odgers, who gave some interesting reminiscences of his early years in Plymouth.

Stockton-on-Tees.—The 227th Anniversary of the Unitarian Church was celebrated on Sunday, May 9, when the Rev. E. T. Russell, of Edinburgh, preached to very good congregations. On Monday, May 10, the spring conference of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Association was held at Stockton, and attended by ministers and friends from Newcastle, Darlington, Middlesbrough, Barnard Castle, Sunderland, Carlisle and other northern towns. At the afternoon meeting the chair was taken by the Rev. A. Hall of Newcastle, in the absence of Sir J. Baxter Ellis, the President of the Association. After speaking of the great progress made in the Unitarian Church at Stockton during the ministry of the Rev. A. Scruton, Mr. Hall referred to the war, emphasising the responsibility laid upon men to remove its horrible consequences. The Rev. E. T. Russell delivered an address on the subject, 'At Sea with Chart and Compass Gone,' in the course of which he said that if religious teachers of the past had adopted scientific methods of teaching in the Sunday school and the pulpit, the world to-day would have been in a far different condition. An interesting discussion followed. A public meeting was held at 7 o'clock, when addresses were given by the ministers of churches in the Association, the Rev. A. Scruton in the chair. A hearty welcome was accorded to Miss Phillips, the newly appointed minister at Carlisle. During the four following evenings Open Air Meetings were held in the High Street, conducted by the Rev. E. T. Russell and the Rev. A. Scruton.

NOTES AND JOTTINGS.

THE LATE FATHER MATURIN.

A friend of Father Maturin, who went down in the Lusitania, told a representative of The Westminster Gazette that he acted, as might have been expected, with fine heroism to the last. He exerted a quietening influence on all those about him, endeavouring to calm the women and children and to help them into the boats, and the last that was seen of him was after he had been carrying a child who was separated from its parents, and whom he had given to a lady as he assisted her into one of the boats. "Take this little one," he said to her, "you may be able to find the parents to whom it belongs." Later on the mother was found and the child restored to her. Father Maturin was a most eloquent preacher, and a man of rare simplicity and generosity of heart. He never courted publicity, but he was, says another friend, "a great man in the fullest sense of the word"; and although it cost him more than most people will ever know to take the step of joining the Roman Catholic Church eighteen years ago, when in his fiftieth year, there was never any question of turning from the truth as he saw it, whatever the sacrifice might be. Before that time he was one of the Cowley Fathers, and people flocked from all parts to hear him preach, both in London and Oxford. When he met his death he was returning from America, where he was in great request, after fulfilling a preaching engagement.

THE TRADE IN SONG BIRDS.

A few weeks ago the Justices of the county of Meath, on the motion of Judge Drummond, decided to petition the Lord Lieutenant for further protection for certain birds, laying special stress on the decrease of the skylark and goldfinch. Numbers of goldfinches are caught by bird-catchers from Dublin and shipped to England in small cages, quite half the number, it is said, perishing on the way. The Irish Times recently had some strong comments on the subject, pointing out that the taste for listening to the singing of wild birds in captivity, and teaching them artificial notes, involved a considerable amount of cruelty with little benefit to anybody except in so far as it puts some money into the pockets of those who sell them.

GLASGOW AND THE TEMPERANCE CRUSADE.

It was recently stated at a temperance demonstration in Glasgow that, as the result of a patriotic pledge-signing campaign, 167,759 persons have promised to abstain from drink for the period of the war. The total population is 1,800,000, but only persons over fourteen were asked to sign, the Roman Catholics declined to take part, and 50,000 soldiers are away on duty. The total number of signatures received is fully equal to one in six of the entire census population.

A New Hymn Book.

HYMNS FOR LITTLE CHILDREN

Suitable for Infant Classes,
Primary Departments, and the Home.

In limp cloth, 3d. net; postage, 1d.

It is the aim of this book to provide hymns and verses for the use of the youngest children in our Sunday schools. Only those hymns have been included which seemed to be, in ideas and in language, within the understanding of little ones below the age of eight or nine; and many will be found suited to the youngest "beginners."

The need for such a hymn book has been specially brought out by the recent developments in grading, and in the separation of departments in our Sunday schools. It is being widely recognised that the infant class or primary department should have not only its own lessons but its own hymns also; and it is hoped that teachers may welcome this little collection, which seeks at the same time to meet the understanding of young children and to lay for them the foundations of our own type of religious faith.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The address for our Belgian Hospital Fund, to which cheques and parcels of clothing should be sent, is Mrs. Bernard Allen, 14, Gainsborough Gardens, Hampstead, N.W.

OUR first word must be as usual about our Belgian Hospital Fund. Not only are those of us who are in close touch with its management deeply conscious of the relief which it affords for our own minds amid the oppression and horror of the war; we are also receiving continually fresh evidence of the widespread interest which the work has aroused. Here is a splendid enterprise of helpfulness, about which there can be no difference or hesitation. It must go on though Governments rise and fall and battles are lost or won. We have received this week numerous hospital lists. As we expected they are much heavier than any we have had before. They have been carefully checked and reduced, many of them by an eminent Belgian officer on the spot, and their demands must be met. Clothing, drugs and equipment are being packed with all possible despatch, and a large consignment of cases will leave London before these words are in the hands of our readers. It will be a heavy drain upon our resources, but we know that we have only to ask for more. Mrs. Allen was to leave for the North of France on Friday. She will have much to report on her return.

The civilian branch of our work has now taken firm root, and we have every reason to believe that it is the means of bringing safety, health, and friendship to the refugees who have been shelled out of their desolate homes. Many of them have been terribly wounded, and others are suffering in ways that are worse than physical pain. The hospital which we have promised to support with a contribution of £50 per month has been established in a convent, where the sisters will serve as nurses. They will also, we may be sure, act as friends and consolers to the poor afflicted people with the noble heroism and the grace of unselfishness which has distinguished the Catholic sisterhoods of Belgium and France since the beginning of the war.

WE have sent out already an ambulance and a motor-car to help in this work. Mrs. Allen received a letter this week from Miss Fyfe, written last Saturday, the day after the car arrived. "I have been over 100 miles in the Ford already," she writes, "with my capital chauffeur Baron —, and I cannot tell you how grateful I am to you for your efforts for securing this good for the Belgians. I was able to arrange things in my own way without always that arrière pensée, perhaps I may not be able to have a car to carry it out. It became a nightmare to me when I thought of bombarded villages like Ypres occurring again and my not having a car to get there in." Many of our readers have taken a special interest in the work for expectant mothers, and nothing appeals so directly to our tenderest feelings as the cherishing of the infant life of the new Belgium that is to be. The following passage from the same letter will go straight to many a mother's heart: "The things you have sent for the Maternité are simply splendid. The room looks so nice, and homely and the women are all so happy. We have about ten there now, and I evacuated three to Calais yesterday, and have six on the list to come in."

WE have little to add to what we wrote about the Coalition Government last week. The list of the new Cabinet was published on Wednesday morning. In this time of crisis it is a list not for criticism but for acceptance. It is tempting, no doubt, to wonder why some names are to be found there and others are excluded, or to indulge in anxious thoughts about many of the causes which have enlisted our strongest loyalty in the past. But it is not the time for these things. Our one business is to finish the war, and to finish it with credit and overwhelming strength. In no other way can the political life of the British democracy be restored to its normal condition; and when this happens there may be fresh methods of approach, some softening of the old bitterness, some keener desire for mutual understanding, a deeper realisation of the common life which lies behind party warfare, because the hearts of all high-minded men have been cleansed and renewed.

AT the same time it would not be right to allow some of the members of the late Administration to drop out of public life without paying a tribute of gratitude and admiration for their high souled patriotism. They have gone, not because they have failed, but simply in order to make re-arrangement easy. Self-effacement in the midst of a public career is a rare and difficult virtue, and this great service to the state must not be forgotten. Among the men who have gone Lord Haldane stands apart. He has been the object of mean and virulent attacks by the groundlings of journalism, in which bad manners have gone hand in hand with ignorance and stupidity. A man of intellectual distinction with a remarkable faculty for administrative detail, his withdrawal leaves the Cabinet poorer in breadth of view and the kindling influence of a strong intelligence. He understands Germany, both in her strength and her weakness, as few of his countrymen do, and this is a gift which ought not to be withdrawn from the public service either in the prosecution of the war or the making of peace.

* * *

BEFORE we pass away from the political situation it is impossible to avoid some reference to the personal cabals which have been carried on in a portion of the Press. They have been quite unworthy of the best traditions of English life and criminally reckless about the danger to the nation, so long as some personal ambition could be gratified. This kind of thing has grown bold by success, but it blundered badly when it began to attack Lord Kitchener. The burning of the Daily Mail on the Stock Exchange and various other steps which have been taken to stamp on the evil are evidence of a healthy reaction in public opinion. If this menace to public safety should rear its ugly head again we hope that the new Government will deal with it with the utmost sternness without any respect of persons. As for the ordinary citizen, who is often puzzled and misled by this sort of thing, let him remember that a leading article, which professes to reflect the opinion of the country, is the product of a single pen, and that the pen often writes as it does because it has to obey the orders of the financial power behind.

* * *

THE withdrawal of Mr. Lloyd George from the Treasury and his appointment to a new office for the organisation and control of the manufacture of munitions may be taken as the prelude to a revolution in our industrial life. We have to face the fact that there has been grave searching of heart among those who are fully acquainted with all the facts of the case about the adequacy of our present system of uncontrolled liberty at a time when the State is in danger. Voluntaryism has worked admirably in the army. It has given us the picked men of the nation as fast as they can be trained; but it has had the effect of withdrawing many of the most efficient workers from industry, leaving us with the slackers or with too large a proportion of men who are past their prime. If compulsion has to come in on the industrial side it will rob enrolment for national service of some of its sting, for the aim will be greater efficiency rather than military ambition, and our eyes will be fixed at least as much upon the workshop as upon the camp.

* * *

IN this connection we are often asked to admire the wonderful strength and organisation of Germany to our own disadvantage. It is well to remember that we could have been her equal in these respects if we had taken the necessary steps; but then we should have developed a lower type of civilisation and lost our soul, as Germany has done. In devotion to the supreme aim of efficiency for military ends Germany has grown sterile in most of the qualities which make a people truly great, in intellect, in imagination, in the love of freedom and devotion to public justice and honour. Some disadvantage in the early stages of the war is a small price to pay for all that we have gained by pursuing a different aim. Nor must we give way to a spirit of grumbling and impatience, because things have not moved as quickly as some of us must have wished in the direction of unified effort. A free people cannot be dragooned; it must be won. It surrenders its prejudices and its familiar habits with reluctance; but when it turns at last with its whole heart to face the danger and to do its duty, it is with an invincible strength, which is far beyond the reach of machine-made virtues.

* * *

WE have received several letters of strong dissent from the views which we expressed last week on the subject of the use of gas as a weapon by the British army. We are glad to print a few of them, in order that an opinion different from our own may have full and adequate opportunity of making itself heard. May we suggest, however, to some of our correspondents that it is not a very effective mode of argument simply to bombard us with barbaric adjectives. We hope that we are just as jealous of the honour of England as they are and just as anxious that she should fight with clean hands. The difference between us is not the contrast between high and elevated feelings of humanity on the one side, and base desires of revenge on the other. It is a difference of judgment in a difficult situation where men who are equally tender-hearted and equally sensitive to scruples of conscience may take different sides.

WE are surprised to find that our correspondents make so little of the breach of honour on the German side. To us that is a cardinal fact in the situation. Here is a deadly weapon, which we could not use, until the Germans annulled the compact by their treachery. But, though the compact is destroyed and the obligations of honour are annulled, we are told that we shall degrade our army and stain our national character with indelible shame if we have recourse to it now, even in a modified and more humane form. The argument seems to have its origin in a feeling of revolt against horrible forms of physical suffering. Do our correspondents realise the kind of suffering, the maiming and the torture, which are produced by modern weapons, against which no exception is taken on the ground that they are barbarous and unfit for use in civilised warfare? Having heard much of these things we cannot make this distinction. The whole thing is horrible beyond the power of words to express it, but we cannot agree that a lyddite shell is a clean and honourable weapon while gas is base and dishonouring, if both sides are free to use it. If the argument is pressed home it means this, that we ought to answer shell with shell, but that it would be shameful to meet gas with gas, even if this kind of one-sided warfare should mean the invasion of England and the letting loose of hell in our midst. Can we really accept such a conclusion and plead that it is based on rational and moral grounds, from which every trace of sentimentality has been eliminated?

* * *

THE numerous friends of the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed in all parts of the country will be delighted to hear that the University of Leeds has decided to confer upon him the honorary degree of Doctor of Letters. Of the range of Mr. Wicksteed's scholarship and the subtle power of his literary and intellectual gifts there is no need for us to speak. His early excursions in Biblical study have been eclipsed by his devotion to Dante and English poetry and his kindling influence as a teacher. And now as he stands on the borderland of old age, he has returned with new zest to the classics with a course of lectures on the Greek Tragedians, which for many people has provided intellectual stimulus and spiritual help of the highest kind during the past winter.

* * *

WE hear with much pleasure that the Rev. Charles Hargrove is also to receive a similar honour. Nothing could be more fitting at the close of his long life in Leeds. For nearly forty years he has been connected with the public life of the city, and has conferred innumerable benefits upon it by his moral earnestness, his broad-minded tolerance, and his intellectual gifts.

THE CHURCH AND THE ARMY.

IN the recent letter by the Archbishop of Canterbury to the Prime Minister, a solemn pledge was given that the Church would do all in its power to mobilise the forces of the country for the service and the self-sacrifice which the war requires. But there was an unfortunate vagueness about the promise, and many people must have been left in some bewilderment about its precise meaning. Was it intended to be a hint that the prohibition which the bishops placed upon the enlistment of the clergy at the beginning of the war is about to be withdrawn? Are the stalwart young curates at last to be allowed to take their share in the task which they commend daily as noble and honourable for other men? To these questions the Bishop of London has supplied a partial answer. It is announced that his Ordination Candidates Council has passed the following resolution:—"That no application on behalf of any candidate be considered unless the candidate proves to the satisfaction of the Council that he is unable to serve for the war." This policy is as wise as it is timely, and we should be glad to see it accepted by all who are responsible for the training of young men for the ministry. There is unfortunately no satisfactory evidence that the theological colleges have done their duty in this matter. They ought to have contributed at least as high a percentage of men to the cause of honour and freedom as the older foundations of Oxford and Cambridge. We do not envy the young men who stay at home in peaceful haunts to study the Greek Testament or to read philosophy or to dream of preaching the gospel of self-sacrifice in a crowded church, while their comrades in medicine, in the law, in teaching and in commerce, are risking their lives for their country. The day may come when they will remember with bitter self-reproach that they accepted their deliverance at the hands of men, whose burden and sacrifice they refused to share.

But what of the men who have passed beyond the years of preparation and are now definitely enlisted in the ranks of the Christian ministry? Apparently "Orders" are still to prove a barrier to military service in spite of the large numbers of priests who are serving in the French army. This is a matter which the Church of England must settle for itself; though we think it will make a tragic mistake from the spiritual point of view, if it continues to forbid its younger clergy to follow what may seem to them a clear call of duty. For the moment let us turn to the hundreds of young men in the ministry of the Free Churches. Here there is no voice of authority to forbid them to go, but something else almost equally strong has kept them back. There is a vague public sentiment that it cannot be expected, and there is a certain element of esprit de corps which rebels against any line of action which is out of harmony with the accepted standards of ministerial conduct. We believe that in this way a great deal of capacity for noble sacrifice may be frustrated of its purpose.

There are, however, two other reasons which deserve some serious consideration. Some men are held back by a genuine sense of the importance of the work in which they are engaged. It has been impressed upon their minds that the country is in sore need of spiritual help, and consequently they cannot be spared. That is an argument which applies with equal force to thousands of laymen, but the sense of the more imperative duty has prevailed. If the younger men in the ministry follow their example we shall miss them greatly, but the work of religion will go on. Some churches can be grouped till the war is over, or there are ministers in retirement who will be glad to come back into active work for a season. The minister must not allow himself to indulge in nice scruples and arguments of loss and gain which he would despise in another man, when the voice of duty calls. The dislocation in religious work is a problem, which is quite capable of a good solution.

But a more serious objection arises from the feeling that there is something inconsistent between the life of a soldier and the sacred calling of a minister. We believe that many ministers feel this very strongly for themselves. They fear that they would be so soiled and stained by a campaign that they could never resume the office of a public teacher of religion. Is such an attitude either reasonable or right? It is neither for those who urge others to enlist. This is a matter upon which we need a good dose of candour and sincerity. From thousands of pulpits and platforms in the land we hear the praises of those who are willing to go, and when they fall we crown them as martyrs. The churches have sent their young men, here the superintendant of the Sunday School, here the leader of the choir, here the plain Christian who has done his best to keep himself unspotted from the world; and they are all proud of their rolls of honour. The older ministers have sent their sons, with all the gracious influences of a Christian home resting upon them, many of them brighter with promise than their fathers have ever been, and how these fathers long that they were young enough to go in their stead! No persuasion has been necessary, but how bitter would have been the thought if they had not been willing to go. Let the young minister of military age consider these things, and if he still feels that he would be alienated from his holy calling if he shared the vigil of the camp and the life of the trenches, let him cease from all words of public admiration for those who lay down their lives for their friends.

We have written about this matter with an unstudied plainness of speech, not because we want to be dogmatic about it or to prescribe another man's duty for him in a difficult situation; but the fire has been burning within and the word had to be spoken. It is action that is needed now, not precept, and admiration for another man's virtue is a poor way of compounding for the absence of a moving example in ourselves. Already the air is thick with speculation about the larger faith and the keener insight into the meaning of religion and the deeper seriousness of life, which may emerge from the war. These forces must be guided and interpreted, not by the veterans whose thought is set and whose days of service are nearly done, but by the young men. And among them those will be best able to help their fellows who have themselves lived in the heart of the tragedy and accepted the searching discipline of character, which comes from the sharp sting of danger and a close contest with death.

But what of those who return no more, for if many go, some will certainly fall? They will be numbered among the honourable company of men who died that others might live. In their short ministry nothing will be so fruitful as their way of leaving it, for the blood of the martyrs is the seed of the Church.

Good Thoughts for Evil Times.

THEREFORE "gird up thyself, and come to stand

Unflinching under the unfaltering Hand,
That waits to prove thee to the uttermost!

It were not hard to suffer by his Hand,
If thou couldst see his face;—but in the dark!

That is the one last trial;—be it so.
Christ was forsaken, so must thou be too:
How couldst thou suffer, but in seeming, else?

Thou wilt not see the face nor feel the hand,

Only the cruel crushing of the feet,
When through the bitter night the Lord comes down

To tread the winepress. Not by sight, but faith!

Endure, endure—be faithful to the end!
H. HAMILTON KING.

ON THE LOVE OF OUR COUNTRY.

THE love of our country has been ridiculed by some modern enthusiasts, as too narrow a field for the benevolence of an enlightened mind; they are for comprehending the whole human race in our affections, and deem any partiality shown to the particular country in which we happen to be born as a narrow, and unphilosophical preference. Now, it would be difficult to say whether complete selfishness, or universal philanthropy, is the most likely to mislead us from that sound practical goodness in which the beauty of Christianity, and the merit of a Christian, consist. Our sphere of thought has hardly any limits, our sphere of action hardly any extent; we may speculate on worlds, we must act in families, in districts, and in kingdoms; and if we contract a distaste for the good we can do, because it is not equal to the good we can conceive, we only sacrifice deeds to words, and rule our lives by maxims of the most idle and ostentatious sentiment. SYDNEY SMITH.

PROTECT, O Lord, thy suppliants, support their weakness, and wash away their earthly stains; and, while they walk amid the darkness of this mortal life, do thou ever quicken them by thy light. Deliver them in thy mercy from all evils, and grant them to attain the height of good, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

THE JUDGMENT OF GOD IN WAR TIME.

BY THE REV. V. D. DAVIS, B.A.

"The work of righteousness shall be peace, and the effect of righteousness, quietness, and confidence for ever."—Isaiah xxxii. 17.

"Know ye not that ye are a temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you?"—I Cor. iii. 16.

"The Spirit searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God."—I Cor. ii. 10.

WE are met together this evening as a people pledged to the service of God, with a common tradition of religious life, tested in many generations of earnest effort, in the freedom of the spirit, taking truth for our authority in the open way of life, hungering for righteousness as the strength of the Eternal, believing with all our heart that Love is the greatest of all, seeking in the experience of each new generation for a greater simplicity and sincerity of Christian discipleship. As children of our Father in heaven, as citizens of the Kingdom of God on earth, according to the laws of life after the mind of Christ, we have desired in each generation, and we desire to-day, to be found faithful in our place. And at this Whitsuntide, the festival of the Spirit, we claim the privilege of our inheritance, with the whole Christian Church, the privilege of a common aspiration and thanksgiving, that we may be gathered into that great communion of the deeper life, to seek a new cleansing and quickening, a new enlightenment, and a fuller measure of the love that hopeth and endureth all things, and is stronger than death.

Would that I might speak to you of these things now, of some aspects, at least, of the happy fellowship of life in our congregations; of what is open to them as true homes of the spirit, rich in the inspiration of worship, gracious in friendliness, careful of the young life growing up in their midst, earnest and reverent in the culture of devotion; or of the strong confidence of truth, the fearlessness with which we may give ourselves into the hands of God, to be led in his way, his witnesses in single-hearted loyalty, to receive from him new enlightenment of the understanding heart, and so to gain fresh vision of the glory of life and the high ideal, which is the call of God to the soul; or, again, of the new demands of duty, faced by the perplexities and the progressive life of the world, through which all men and women of goodwill must be bound together in mutual service, for social uplifting and the achievement of a true brotherhood, through which all the divisions of the churches and all sectarian bitterness and mistrust would be broken down, and we be brought indeed to unity of spirit in the bond of peace, and at last the rule of God, the kingdom in our midst, be established in the earth.

The Annual Sermon on behalf of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, preached at Essex Church, Kensington, on Tuesday, May 25, 1915.

These are things on which it would be a happiness to take counsel together in the light of our united worship; but at this moment they are barred to us in face of another terrible and insistent claim.

God holds us now in the midst of the agony of war. This is the burden laid on every heart, overshadowed by the dreadful thought of the tragedy in which the whole of Europe is involved, and indeed all the peoples of the earth. Though we see it from afar, the tumult of the storm beats upon us with horror at the spectacle of awful slaughter, the best and bravest pitilessly destroyed, the desolation of the lands, the cruel sufferings of multitudes of inoffensive people, the pathetic tale of the wounded and the maimed for life, and in innumerable homes the silent sorrow for those who return no more; and through it all, the darker elements of fierce and evil passion, of infamy and ruthless barbarism. "War is Hell," was General Sherman's cry, wrung from terrible experience in the American Civil War; and after the experience of the last ten months, and now the testimony of the Bryce Commission, is there not something more to add? Yes, Hell indeed, and it breeds devils!

But not that alone. Dark and terrible as is the hour, the strength of a true manhood emerges, fearless and heroic, steadfast to uphold the right, to endure to the uttermost, heedless of death, so only that the cause prevail. Now the plain man proves himself a hero; but there are no heroics. It is nothing that he gives his life to carry a wounded comrade from the field, or that he throws himself into a hopeless breach, or rides alone through a furious storm of death to carry a vital message, or goes down, silent and unmoved, at his post of duty, on the smitten ship. The man has given his life, and has simply done what was required of a man; but the passion is the deathless passion of loyalty and love. There they are in thousands, in hundreds of thousands, those who come through and those who die, equally steadfast and unafraid, a willing sacrifice, a man for his friend, for truth and honour, for justice, in pity and burning indignation for the cruelly wronged, for a martyred people, or again, for the homeland, for the welfare of the world. That is in the fighting-line; and close at hand, with equal self-forgetfulness and fearlessness of death, are those who go to care for the fallen, or minister to the daily needs of the forces. And at home the whole nation, with only few and ignoble exceptions, sordid in self-interest—but, except for them, the whole nation is bent upon the one steadfast purpose, to do the work of the hour, to maintain the cause, to endure and make whatever sacrifice is required. And often is it not true that the hardest sacrifice is asked of those at home, for the young wife has given her husband, and the widowed mother her only son, and none can tell what the issue may be. Only the purest self-surrender and devotion to a noble cause can nerve the woman's heart to be equal to that need.

This is war, from the testing of which in our daily life we can none of us escape. It is for all the nations a terrible judgment of God in their midst, and we have to ask of Him what it means, how we shall endure it, and what it is that He now demands of us. It is the Spirit that searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God.

And the first word for our people in this matter is that we are standing for the right. We did not seek and we did not want war. For years the steadfast purpose of this country had been to maintain peace and to secure a happier concord among the nations. But at the fateful moment last July, when the crisis had been forced on Europe, the call of duty and of honour was imperative. We could not desert the little land we were pledged with all our strength to keep inviolate, or if that might not be, then to rescue and restore to independence; nor could we betray our friend and neighbour, threatened by an over-whelming danger, simply to save our skin. And every month in the progress of the war has made it more clear that, apart from the special occasion and questions of responsibility at various stages of diplomacy in the past, this is a conflict of life and death not simply between the nations, but between two principles of conduct, two ideals of national and international life, which constitutes a vital issue for the whole world. We are standing for the higher law of right, as against ruthless self-assertion on the part of one power, as against the breaker of pledges, the tempter of others to a like treachery, as against a cynical and brutal cruelty, which defies the better feeling and the conscience of the civilised world.

But at this point is there not a protest that ought to be made? The use by Germany of poisonous gas as an instrument of war, paralleled by the poisoning of the wells in South West Africa, roused instantly a cry of horror and hot indignation. It was not simply that it was a breach of honourable agreement. That, unhappily, could no longer cause surprise in this conflict. But it is recognised that the thing itself is a horrible cruelty, subjecting its victims in too many cases to a lingering death of torture. And yet now it has been declared in Parliament, and without protest, that this diabolical instrument (that is the word) must as a matter of military necessity be used by Great Britain and France against their foes. That, I cannot but think, would be a bitter humiliation for this country. Can science not compass the adequate protection of our men from this insidious and horrible danger, and spare us the shame of taking up the same base weapon? And if, as we must still dare to hope, that can be done, will not our weapons be the keener and our forces the more overwhelming, because we have kept untainted our honest indignation at this latest form of German barbarism?

We are standing for the higher law of right, for honour and humanity. We had hoped that such a war as this should never be again—and it ought not to have been. But now we see the horror of a great darkness before us, with a growing storm of hatred and mutual destruction, one conflict only leading to another, with yet deadlier weapons and more diabolical ingenuity in the art of slaughter, unless for the nations of Europe this one awful lesson shall suffice to convince them of the criminal insanity of war, and in their counsels the nobler elements of life, justice and humanity, commonsense and brotherly love, shall at last prevail.

It is a dreadful nemesis that has come upon us now, and we have to face the storm and for our life hold fast to those things which keep us true to the ideal of the kingdom of God. It is a nemesis too surely foreseen by those who through long years have been protesting against the insane rivalry in armaments among the nations and the growing oppression of the burden, which was destroying hope and crushing out the very life of the people.

The protest was never, perhaps, more forcibly made than by Sir Edward Grey, four years ago, in a debate on naval estimates:—

"If this tremendous expenditure on armaments goes on," he said, "it must in the long run break down civilisation. You are having this great burden of force piled up in times of peace, and if it goes on increasing by leaps and bounds, as it has done in the last generation, in time it will become intolerable. There are those who think it will lead to war, precisely because it is becoming intolerable. I think it is much more likely the burden will be dissipated by internal revolution—not by nations fighting against each other, but by the revolt of masses of men against taxation.... The great nations of the world are in bondage to their armies and navies at the present moment—increasing bondage. It does not seem to me impossible, that in some future years they may discover, as individuals have discovered, that law is a better remedy than force."

That was the hope—how bitterly at this moment disappointed! But still the hope must be in the masses of the people, their humanity, their true instincts, their wholesome commonsense. To them the appeal must be made, men and women together, in equal right and equal responsibility, to realise their power, to insist that there is a law of God to be obeyed, and to enter upon their great inheritance of life, where honour, truth and justice, pity and brotherly love shall prevail.

But first this terrible judgment on our slowness of heart has to be endured. All the pleadings of good will, all the efforts of sincere friendship for a better understanding, for breaking down prejudices and overcoming evil jealousy, for drawing more closely the bonds of sympathy and mutual interest and co-operation in furtherance of the true ends of life, all efforts of the Christian Churches—too late, alas, attempted!—to make the voice of Divine reconciliation effectually heard—all, have proved for the moment, in vain; and if now we are to be saved it must be so as by fire, purged and proved in this awful conflagration.

But out of it the hope still endures that the ideal of public right shall at last be made effective in the affairs of nations over lawless ambition and insolent aggressive power. That was Gladstone's ideal, and since the outbreak of the war it has been nobly set before our people by the Prime Minister. It must mean, he has repeatedly declared, the definite repudiation of militarism as the governing factor in the relations of states, and of the moulding of the European world. It must secure the independent existence and the free development of the smaller nationalities—each with a corporate consciousness of its own; and it must finally achieve the substitution for force and the clash of competing ambition, of a real European partnership, based on a recognition of equal right, and established and enforced by a common law.

That is an aim steadily to be kept in view. And it is well expressed in the published policy of the Union of Democratic Control, which declares that the policy of Great Britain should be directed to "concerted action between the Powers, and the setting up of an International Council, whose deliberations and decisions shall be public, with such machinery for securing international agreement as shall be the guarantee of an abiding peace." Some such means for the control of lawless power and the maintenance of a better right must be found, if all the sacrifices of this war are not to be in vain.

At first, when the victory in this world conflict has been achieved—and achieved it must be at any sacrifice—it may have to be an enforced and armed peace, through which the majority of the nations, pledged to maintain the common law and the common good, will hold the aggressor in check. But surely the time will come, when by general consent the authority of a supreme court in the United States of Europe will be acknowledged, when moral and spiritual forces in a better manhood will be supreme, and the old nightmare of hatred and mistrust will be dissipated. Then, without need of compulsion, justice will be done and a true peace be established in the earth.

And when I speak of our hope as centred in the peoples, let it not be supposed that I am thinking only of those on one side in this conflict. For Germany the war has been terribly embittered and the moral issues hopelessly confused, as we believe, largely through ignorance and confidence in a false leadership and an evil system, through
